I will say for myself, without being responsible to anybody else for what I say, that I am perfectly willing, if these matters are to be insisted upon as proposed, that these questions shall go over to another Congress, and let the men who are to come in on the 4th of March and who have been elected this year take the responsibility of settling them. It is perfectly well known that the Navy now is being run without appropriations. Why? Because the two Houses are at difference with reference to the amount of appropriation and the method of appropriation. If we are to follow the suggestions only of the House of Representatives, then, as a matter of course, we can easily pass these bills. We can easily pass the pension bill with all its legislation, whether vicious or beneficial. I do not know but that the Committee on Appropriations has ability enough, with all its imbecility, to examine these nine sections and ascertain whether or not they are necessary for the promotion of the interests of the administration of the Pension Department, and whether or not they are necessary to correct evils in the legislation of the last session. But it is not the business of the Committee on Appropriations, as I have said over and over again on this floor, to engage in the examination of these matters of legislation. It is our business, and we have adhered to it as rigidly as we could, to recommend appropriations of public money, and not to recommend legislation; and although the Senator from Kansas seems to think that we have yielded always upon such questions to the House of Representatives, if he will exert his giant intellect in a more careful examination of the record he will see that, taking the last three or four years, we have in many instances and in a majority of instances overcome and exhausted the House of Representatives, which he so largely respects, and which I also respect. In other words, if we are to sum up and weigh in the scales with the Senator from Kansas the number of surrenders and the number of successes, I think, with all due deference to what my friend so well knows, he will find that the House of Representatives in many instances would kick the beam.

Mr. President, it is an easy thing for a Senator to stand in his place here and scold the Committee on Appropriations. It is an easy thing for him to shut his eyes and fold his arms and slumber for a week or two at the close of the session or for three or four months during the session, and then come here and in a genteel and courteous philippic deliver himself with regard to the Committee on Appropriations and talk about their surrendering, talk about their imbecility and their infirmity. That, I say, is an easy thing to do; but I think if Senators who indulge in that sort of pleasantry were for a little time to have the responsibility of the Committee on Appropriations, they would see that it is not always easy sailing, that it is not always easy to drive a body, to say, "Thus you shall do, or else nothing shall be done." I know that that can sometimes be accomplished, and I often wish that I had the Senator from Kansas—I now wish it—by my side when these questions are up so that he could show his vigor and his energy, because I think it would be a great advantage to us sometimes at the close of a session on the morning of the 4th of March, perhaps at 2 or 3 o'clock, when we are endeavoring to compose the differences on appropriation bills; but unfortunately for the Committee on Appropriations they have for their membership mortal men only. They have a different class of persons from the Senator from Kansas; they have Senators who perhaps are more yielding in their disposition, have more infirmities than he has. We do the best we can; and if the Senate is not satisfied with our work it is an easy thing for it to reorganize the Committee on Appropriations and put the Senator from Kansas at the head of it. I do not object to that. I only say that while I am chairman of that committee, and while the committee is composed as it is, we will do the best we can with these great questions under the rules of the Senate. When we drop into error by reason of our infirmity we ask Senators, seventy-six of them here, to stand up in their rigidity and frigidity and tell us that we are surrendering to the House what we ought not to surrender; but if they sit in their seats with that quietude and gentleness which often characterizes the Senate when the report of a conference committee comes in, and if they will persist in doing that, or if my friend from Kansas, who is always in his seat on such occasions, remains there quietly, then I submit that the Committee on Appropriations have some reason to believe that the Senate is in accord with them in the suggestions that they make to the body in relation to the com position of the differences between the two Houses.

Now, Mr. President, I have introduced this measure and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions. I do not know that it will aid the Senate in coming to a correct conclusion with reference to this important legislation, but it certainly can do no harm to have the question considered by the important committee of this body whose duty it is under the rules of the Senate to consider pension legislation.

Mr. EDMUNDS (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). It is 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One minute of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think——

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to say one word in justification of the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is due to the Committee on Pensions that I should state that if the committee of conference had followed the recommendations which were made by the Committee on Pensions to the Senate in Senate bill 1407, introduced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and reported to this body from the Committee on Pensions by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON], it would have done what is right and what the Committee on Pensions of the Senate think it would have been right to do.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator if he has any reason to suppose that the committee of conference omitted to do what the Committee on Pensions recommended?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir; there is a very important, and I think significant omission in the transcription of the amendment as presented.

Mr. DAWES. I do not inquire whether the legislation which actually came from the committee of conference was correct, but I only wish to inquire if the Senator has any evidence that the committee of conference did not insist upon the bill of the Senate Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have none whatever, and I have no desire to charge anything to the committee of conference on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Senate to allow me to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the matter which has been under consideration shall be continued. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. I hope the regular order will be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be laid before the Senate. It is the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the Senate upon the question which has been before the Senate during the morning. If there be no objection, that will be allowed.

Mr. HARRIS. The unfinished business being laid aside informally?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending that the unfinished business will be informally laid aside.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to ascertain what the purpose of the motion is. I did not hear what the motion was.

Mr. MITCHELL. I made no motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is merely to set aside informally the unfinished business.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a singular thing that this conference committee's report on the legislation which is on the statute-book is in the very words almost of the bill which was presented by the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, and follows the language of that bill down to the point where it leaves out these words relating to the application of section 4768 of the Revised Statutes to certain pension cases:

Nor in any case filed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions after June 20, 1878, and prior to the date of this act.

Those words were stricken out of the bill as it came before us in the conference committee report and as it stands on the statute-book. If they had been retained all this difficulty would have been avoided, because they expressly provided that the legislation should not apply to any of those cases which arose from the time of the passage of the act of 1878 down to the time of the passage of this law. In other words, the law would have been left to apply simply to cases arising in the future as the words of the bill reported from the Committee on Pensions expressly declared. I do not know how it occurred, but to my mind it is a very singular circumstance.

Mr. DAWES. As I have stated, I was upon that committee of conference. I stated to the Senate how the result came about. Though I have seen the practice indulged in very much in debate here, I have always considered it out of order to allude to the deliberations of committees in reference to measures pending in this body. I could tell the Senator where the draught of the existing law was made which the committee of conference on the part of the Senate, after having insisted upon the bill suggested by the Committee on Pensions, were compelled to adopt or lose the appropriation bill. But, Mr. President, I am free to say, and I am bound to say, that the provisions of the bill incurred my opposition, for one, in that committee of conference, and I only yielded in signing the report to the necessity which I have stated here. But arguments were presented to that committee of conference of this kind: It was said that the old cases were paralyzed and slept, because the fee of $10 in those old cases in a great many instances was insufficient to compensate attorneys for the actual labor in bringing them to a final determination; that the cases now existing were cases of a different character from those that originated and where application had been made when the ten-dollar fee was fixed; that a great deal more labor was necessary in sifting evidence and in procuring evidence on the part of attorneys; and they ceased to make that effort and the applicants were pressing members of Congress and pressing everybody to know why claims that had been filed five and six and eight years ago nobody had heard from, and they could not get any hearing.

It was represented to the committee of conference that in most of these cases it was fair and just and proper that the claim agent honestly pursuing his calling should have more compensation than the $10, and that that was as applicable to old applications as to new ones. That was the ground on which the committee of conference were induced to adopt the form of the existing legislation as their report. To me it seemed that it would result precisely as it did, that every applicant whose case was undetermined in that Department would have a circular sent out from Washington—that was the statement I made at that time which was repeated in the other branch—from which he would infer that the law required that people pay $25, and that the Commissioner of Pensions would only perform some perfunctory operation and indorse every new agreement for $25. So exactly it has turned out, with this exception, that the Commissioner in an effort to do his duty under that provision has established a bureau, as I understand, to examine into the work which each agent has been performing under the new contracts, to see whether $25 or a less sum should be allowed when the pension has been granted.

The Senator from Pennsylvania brought in here a bill which seemed to the committee of conference to be wiser and better than the provision which came from the House of Representatives and than the provision which was finally adopted; but that committee of conference acted as they understood all committees of conference are required to act, and acted under what they supposed was the permission of a committee of conference, not to stand without yielding, for that is no conference. It is no conference committee that goes instructed. A conference committee is bound by the commission that appoints it to confer freely and to bring out of the conference something to which all sides will agree, rather than to stand in the spirit of the Senator from Kansas upon the vote of the House they represent and yield to nothing. A committee of conference is a useless waste of time and machinery if that is all it has to do. Whether in the end the result is wise or not the body to whom they make their report must determine, and the body to whom they make their report is as answerable for the character of the legislation that comes with that report as they are as to the report of any committee. The report of a committee of conference in that respect does not differ from the report of any other committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. The remarks just made by the Senator from Massachusetts induce me to make a statement in explanation of my own conduct as chairman of the Committee on Pensions. I think it is due to that committee and to myself that I should state it, and I do not think I take up very much of the time of the Senate in discussing any subject.

I myself was misled in regard to this amendment made to the pension appropriation bill last year, because the law as it stands and the bill brought in here by the committee of conference pursued the very wording of the bill which had come from the Committee on Pensions, omitting the very important words I have spoken of and making some other changes that misled me. If I had not understood at the time that the conference report substantially agreed with the action of the Senate Committee on Pensions, I should have felt bound to examine into it more carefully. I did so understand. I supposed that it followed this bill substantially to the end, but I find, as I stated, that in the third section, as it appears in the bill as we reported it and the fourth section of the act of Congress as it became a law, the proviso reads:

Provided, That no greater fee than $10 shall be demanded, received, or allowed in any claim for pension or bounty-land granted by special act of Congress, nor in any claim for increase of pension on account of the increase of the disability for which the pension had been allowed, "nor in any case filed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions after June 20, 1878, and prior to the date of this act."

That is the way the law reads; but the bill we reported contains these words, which are omitted:

Nor in any case filed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions after June 20, 1878, and prior to the date of this act.

What was the effect of omitting these words? The effect of it was to apply this legislation to all of the cases standing in the Pension Office which had been filed between these two dates, and that is precisely where this mischief which is attracting the attention of the country creeps in. If these words had been retained in the conference committee report, and were in the law now, that difficulty would be avoided.

I want to say in this connection that I do not think the mischief is nearly as great as many believe it to be. I think that the pension department is able very largely to restrain it and to correct it. My impression is that the Secretary of the Interior has under this very act of Congress sufficient power to make a rule which will control it, for this legislation does contain an important provision on this subject. In the fifth section of the act the Secretary of the Interior is empowered to make rules and regulations. Prior to this time there was no such power vested in the Secretary, and I am inclined to think that, as he has entire control of the whole subject of the employment or engagement of pension attorneys relating to the business before that Department, he may establish a rule which will cut off those gentlemen who are availing themselves of this omission to defraud pension claimants. I trust that the question will be examined and that, if possible, a rule will be made to supply this omission.

I am not disposed to charge any responsibility for this omission on the Committee on Appropriations or on the committee of conference representing that committee on the part of the Senate. That is not my purpose at all; but I think it is important that the country should understand precisely how this thing crept in. It would look to me as if it might have been an error very easily made in the transcription of the law possibly, and it might be well that it should be investigated. I do not believe that any person intentionally omitted that clause from the bill as it came here finally, yet it follows, as I stated before, precisely the bill as reported to the Senate, with this single omission.

In relation to the bill now presented, I can only say that I shall call the attention of the Committee on Pensions to it, and if it is thought desirable make a report at an early day. But we have already acted upon the subject; the bill heretofore reported is still pending before the Senate, and if the Senate desire to take it up and make it the basis of action, the foundation for the action necessary is ready in the bill reported at the last session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is Senate bill No. 2112.

Mr. HOAR. I hope this reference will be made by unanimous consent, so that we shall not spend another morning upon this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the bill introduced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will be referred to the Committee on Pensions. The Chair hears none, and it is so referred.

REPRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to make a motion to have Order of Business 113, being the bill (S. 60) to declare certain lands subject to taxation, reprinted. The edition is exhausted, and I want the usual number of copies reprinted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order to reprint will be made if there be no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4273) for the relief of Madison R. Calvert;

A bill (H. R. 7329) granting right of way to the Fremont, Elk Horn and Missouri Valley Railroad Company across the Fort Robinson military reservation, in the State of Nebraska; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 309) extending the permission granted Maj. William Ludlow by the act of February 28, 1883, to accept a civil position.

PUBLIC POLICY OF CONFEDERATE STATES EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted the following resolution, and asked for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if in his opinion it be not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate a historical statement concerning the public policy of the executive department of the Confederate States during the late war of the rebellion, reported to have been lately filed in the War Department by General William T. Sherman.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie over under the rules and be printed.

RECIPROCITY TREATIES, SO CALLED.

Mr. LAPHAM. I gave notice yesterday that at the close of the morning business to-day I should like to address the Senate on the resolution of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. The time having been otherwise occupied, I suggest to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], as there is to be an executive session at 3 o'clock, that he consent that his bill be laid aside that I may offer my remarks now, which may occupy perhaps an hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent to lay aside the pending bill without losing its place, so that he may address the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. Informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from New York? If not, it will be considered as agreed to. The resolution of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is before the Senate.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. President, I ask to take from the table the President's message for the purpose of basing my remarks upon it, and I send to the desk to be read an extract from it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The countries of the American continent and the adjacent islands are for the United States the natural marts of supply and demand. It is from them that we should obtain what we do not produce or do not produce in sufficiency, and it is to them that the surplus productions of our fields, our mills, and our workshops should flow, under conditions that will equalize or favor them in comparison with foreign competition.

Four paths of policy seem to point to this end.

First, a series of reciprocal commercial treaties with the countries of America which shall foster between us and them an unhampered movement of trade. The conditions of these treaties should be the free admission of such merchandise as this country does not produce, in return for the admission free or under a favored scheme of duties of our own products—the benefits of such exchange to apply only to goods carried under the flag of the parties to the contract; the removal, on both sides, from the vessels so privileged of all tonnage dues and national imposts, so that those vessels may ply unhindered between our ports and those of the other contracting parties, though without infringing on the reserved home coasting trade; the removal or reduction of burdens on the exported products of those countries coming within the benefits of the treaties; and the avoidance of the technical restrictions and penalties by which our intercourse with those countries is at present hampered.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. President, I enter upon the discussion of the important questions involved in the proposed negotiations with a consciousness of my inability to grapple with the magnitude of the subject. It is not my purpose to dwell at length upon the expediency, propriety, or advantages of the details of the proposed treaties. I shall mainly devote my hour to the consideration of the position taken by the opponents of any and all treaties which in any manner relate to the subject of revenue, that they are unconstitutional and, for that reason alone, should be rejected. The honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] in his eloquent and earnest remarks yesterday sought to maintain this position. He and other opponents of such treaties insist that they violate the Constitution because all revenue bills must originate in the House of Representatives, and because to the Congress is given the power to regulate foreign commerce. While these positions may appear plausible at first sight, a closer examination will, I believe, show that they are based upon an erroneous interpretation of the Constitution of the United States.

No one will doubt the soundness of the general proposition that each department of the Government should be confined within its constitutional limits. The error consists in the bold affirmation that a treaty dealing with the subject of revenue can be negotiated only in violation of the organic law. Such an interpretation would deprive the treaty-making power of the right of incorporating in treaties, as has been so often done during our history, stipulations calculated to promote and extend commercial relations with other powers, and thus in the end to increase our revenues and foreign trade. A very large number of our treaties with foreign nations contain provisions at war with the theories of those who advocate this construction. Thus, the treaty of commerce and navigation with France in 1822 embraced numerous provisions of the character named, fixed the duties on a variety of articles, and even provided that the extra duties levied under an act of Congress originating in the House of Representatives in the year 1820 should be refunded. Another treaty with France was framed in 1831, by which the duties on French wines were provided for.

Our treaties with China in 1844 and 1858 contain many provisions in relation to duties on imports and exports. We adopted a treaty with Great Britain in 1794, styled a "treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation," which embraces stipulations on the same subject. The reciprocity treaty with Great Britain, ratified in 1854, remained in force over twelve years. It provided for the admission of British or Canadian products free of duty, and was signed by William L. Marcy. The provisions for the passage of goods in transit in the treaty with Great Britain in 1871 is analogous in its nature, as well as the provisions in the same treaty for the admission of fish and fish oil free of duty, which are still in force.

Many other treaties might be cited containing provisions of a similar character—for instance, the treaty with Borneo, 1850; that with Hanover, 1840; with Japan, 1858 and 1864; with Mexico, 1848; with the Netherlands, 1852; with New Grenada, 1846; with Turkey, 1862; with Peru, 1851; with Siam, 1856.

The last-named treaty contains a tariff-list of both imports and exports.

Our treaty with Japan in 1858 contained important stipulations upon the subject, which was modified by the convention of 1866 establishing a tariff of duties between the United States, Great Britain, the Netherlands, and Japan, and was ratified by the Senate in June, 1868. To this treaty is annexed long schedules of specific duties upon both imports and exports, which on inspection would be open to all the criticisms made by the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the list embraced in the treaty with Mexico.

The commercial reciprocity treaty with the Hawaiian Islands is another instance of the exercise of the power, and the treaty remains in full force.

This usage, continued for so long a period, amounts to an interpretation of the constitutional provision on the subject which is fixed and binding upon the various departments of the Government.

The treaty-making power is granted in these words: "He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." What is implied by this grant? It is unlimited in terms. It must be construed by referring to the common law and the usage of nations on the subject. The grant to Congress of the power to regulate foreign commerce, or to the House of Representatives to originate revenue bills, does not necessarily conflict with it, and can not be permitted to restrict its legitimate exercise. The meaning of the constitutional provision simply is that when a revenue bill is to be enacted by Congress it shall originate in the House, and that when commercial regulations are the subject of legislation instead of a treaty, Congress is to legislate.

Mr. Rawle, a writer of acknowledged merit, in his treatise on the Constitution, places treaties, next to the Constitution, as the supreme law, and designates the laws of Congress as "the third rule of obligation." He also says, while the power of Congress to make laws is laid under restrictions, there are none in respect to treaties. He defines a treaty as a compact between independent nations, extending to such subjects as peace, alliance, commerce, neutrality, &c.

The primary definition of the word commerce is "the exchange of one sort of produce or property for another." Foreign commerce is the trade which one nation carries on with another. Inland commerce is the trade in the exchange of the commodities between citizens of the same nation. The Yankee has a pre-emption of this kind of traffic.

Chancellor Kent, in his chapter on the law of nations (volume 1, page 33), says:

Treaties of commerce defining and establishing the rights and extent of commercial intercourse have been found to be of great utility, and they occupy a very important title in the code of national law. They were considered, even two centuries ago, to be so conducive to the public welfare as to overcome the bigotry of the times; and Lord Coke admitted them to be one of four kinds of national compacts that might lawfully be made with infidels.

And he adds:

Every nation may enter into such commercial treaties, and grant such special privileges as they think proper; and no nation to whom the like privileges are not conceded has a right to take offense, provided those treaties do not affect their perfect rights. A state may enter a treaty by which it grants exclusive privileges to one nation and deprives itself of the liberty to grant similar privileges to any other. Thus Portugal, in 1703, by her treaty with England, gave her the monopoly of her wine trade; and the Dutch, formerly, by a treaty with Ceylon, engrossed the cinnamon trade, and latterly they have monopolized the trade of Japan.

We embraced a stipulation of like character, which was to be enforced for ten years, in the treaty for the acquisition of Florida.

Story, in his Commentaries (volume 3, section 1502, page 355), says:

The power to make treaties is, by the Constitution, general, and of course it embraces all sorts of treaties, for peace or war, for commerce or territory, for alliance or succor, for indemnity for injuries or payment of debts, for the recognition and enforcement of principles of public law, and for any other purposes which the policy or interests of independent sovereigns may dictate in their intercourse with each other.

Story, in another place, adds:

There can be no doubt that the power competent to bind the nation by treaty may alienate the public domain and property by treaty. If a nation has conferred upon its executive department, without reserve, the right of treating and contracting with other states, it is considered as having invested it with all the power necessary to make a valid contract. * * * A power to make treaties of peace necessarily implies a power to decide the terms on which they shall be made.

Even private rights may be sacrificed by treaty to secure the public safety.

These positions are abundantly fortified by citations from Grotius, Puffendorf, and Vattel. It is also laid down by these writers, and others which might be cited, that the treaty-making power is neither exclusively executive nor legislative, but partakes of both. Hence, a treaty is made the supreme law, next in importance to the Constitution.

Judge Story, in his treatise (section 1507), says:

By the ninth article of confederation no treaty of commerce could be made whereby the legislative power of the States could be restrained from imposing such imposts and duties on foreigners as their own people were subject to; or from prohibiting the exportation or importation of any species of goods or commodities whatsoever.

And no treaty of alliance could be made without the consent of nine States. These limitations, he adds, "contributed to the prostration and utter imbecility of the Confederation." The grant without limit to the President and Senate may therefore be regarded as designed to remedy the evils experienced under the Articles of Confederation.

In another section (1509) he says:

It is difficult to circumscribe the power within any definite limits, applicable to all times and exigencies, without impairing its efficacy or defeating its purposes. The Constitution has, therefore, made it general and unqualified.

Mr. President, as I have already stated, under the Articles of Confederation the States reserved the right to impose duties, and yet it was provided that "no State shall lay any imposts or duties which may interfere with any stipulations of treaties entered into by the United States." Not only may portions of our territory be alienated by treaty, but it is now settled that we may acquire territory in the same way. The acquisition of Louisiana and the purchase of Florida and Alaska were all effected by treaty. The propriety of the treaty for the cession of Louisiana was severely challenged at the time, but Judge Story states (section 1292):

At the present day few statesmen are to be found who seriously contest the constitutionality of the purchase and admission of Louisiana into the Union. The general voice of the nation has sustained and supported it. Why, then, should not that general voice be equally respected in relation to other measures of vast public importance, and by many deemed of still more vital interest to the country, such as the tariff.

These citations serve to illustrate the magnitude and gravity of the exercise of the treaty power under our Constitution. To us at home treaties have the force of laws next in importance to the Constitution. With the nations negotiating them they are contracts only, but contracts of the highest character, and imposing the most solemn obligations. The language of the Constitution in regard to their effect and operation is deserving of notice. It is in these words:

This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

Whether the variance in describing laws and treaties was made to cover existing treaties, as some authors have stated, the fact remains that it is laws made in "pursuance of the Constitution," and treaties "made under the authority of the United States," that become the supreme law.

In the light of these general principles I desire to call attention to some of the questions which may arise in the exercise of the treaty-making power as thus provided in the Constitution. By the eighth section of article 1 it is provided that Congress shall have power to pay debts and provide for the general welfare, &c. Can there be any doubt that a treaty may deal with these subjects?

Congress has also power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and with the Indian tribes. Can there be any doubt about the exercise of the treaty-making power on these subjects? Many of our treaties with foreign powers contain regulations as to commerce, and our most important dealings with the Indian tribes have been by treaties.

By the same article Congress has power to establish post-roads, and yet by treaty we have postal conventions with many nations, and could not have obtained them in any other way. Congress has the power to give to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their discoveries; yet we have treaties on the subject of trade-marks with most of the nations with whom we have other treaty relations. Congress has power to declare war, but before a gun is fired or any other hostile act performed the treaty-making power may intervene and stop the contest without bloodshed by a treaty of peace.

Congress has power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories of the United States. But the treaty-making power may be exercised on the subject, and territory be alienated or acquired, as the best interests of the country may demand. Congress has power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization; still, foreigners resident in the Territories, when acquired, have been declared to be clothed with the rights of citizens. In Alaska the treaty for its cession admitted foreigners to all such rights.

When we recall the fact that "all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States" override all State laws and acts of Congress, it would seem that the treaty-making power is not so restricted and circumscribed as the authors of the construction under consideration claim. They assert that the entire field of laying duties belongs to Congress, and that whenever the treaty-making power makes a free-list it usurps a function that does not belong to it. Suppose we should desire to open new commercial relations with a foreign power, or should deem it advantageous to establish a more free and extended intercourse with such power, and to that end it should become necessary to provide for the introduction of our products for a limited time and of a specific character into the dominions of such power, with the admission of its products as an equivalent therefor; Congress could not do that. The treaty-making power can alone accomplish the result.

The exchange of commodities stipulated for in the proposed treaty with Mexico, as was provided in the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain in 1854, can only be secured by the treaty-making power. The fact that this last-named treaty was negotiated and signed by William L. Marcy, who was familiar with the rules of diplomacy and profound in his knowledge of constitutional law, is a guarantee that this treaty was not an unauthorized exercise of power and an open violation of the Constitution.

The great advantages to us of the proposed treaty with Mexico are pointed out in the report of our minister resident, under date of August 14, 1883. By this he shows that while we surrender revenues amounting only to $179,075, we receive an exemption of $742,351. This makes the difference in our favor $563,276 per year, as shown by the imports and exports of 1882. It is a convention for six years only, and is designed to meet the growing wants of both countries in view of the rapidly increasing means of intercommunication by the railroads now in progress.

The position that treaties are beyond the reach of Congressional action is not wholly true. For good reason Congress can annul a treaty as it can repeal a law. By an act of Congress in 1798 Congress annulled our treaty with France. The power given Congress to declare war necessarily carries with it the power to annul treaties.

Mr. MORRILL. Would it interrupt the Senator for me to ask him a question?

Mr. LAPHAM. I prefer to get through, and then I shall cheerfully answer any question.

These are extreme cases. The general rule, as I have stated, is that a treaty overrides all existing laws and prior treaties in conflict with its provisions.

Mr. President, another and conclusive answer to the objection to such treaties is the stipulation contained in them that they shall not be operative until Congress shall have enacted the legislation necessary to carry them into effect.

The statement in the message under consideration is as follows:

> All treaties in the line of this policy which have been negotiated or are in process of negotiation contain a provision deemed to be requisite under the clause of the Constitution limiting to the House of Representatives the authority to originate bills for raising revenue.

There has hitherto been no difficulty in providing the necessary legislation of Congress.

A treaty negotiated and ratified without containing this provision would become the supreme law, and Congress would be as much bound to provide for its execution as for the execution of the laws of its own enacting. The omission to do so would be a casus belli and subject us to national dishonor and disgrace.

It is a solecism to say that a treaty is unconstitutional when the constitutional power to make it is without any limit and it vests entirely in the exercise of the discretion of the President and the Senate. It requires the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate to ratify a treaty. This being more than the usual party majority, no question of partisanship will arise in the consideration of treaties. The language of the President on this subject is as follows:

> It seems to me that many of the embarrassing elements in the great national conflict between protection and free trade may thus be turned to good account; that the revenue may be reduced so as no longer to overtax the people; that protective duties may be retained without becoming burdensome; that our shipping interests may be judiciously encouraged, the currency fixed on firm bases, and above all such an unity of interests established among the states of the American system as will be of great and ever-increasing advantage to them all.

Mr. President, notwithstanding these are the views I entertain of the magnitude and importance of the treaty-making power, I deem it proper to say that I do not yield to the Senator from Vermont or any one else in my firm belief of the necessity and the constitutionality of laws for the protection of our industries and labor.

As I have already shown, under the Articles of Confederation the General Government had no control over the subject. The whole power to legislate upon the subject was reserved to each of the thirteen colonies. Even the treaty-making power was limited so that the consent of nine of the thirteen was necessary to the validity of a treaty. These are stated by writers as the causes which led to the overthrow of the Confederacy and the adoption of our present Constitution, and therefore the treaty power and the legislative power were given without limit in the Constitution. Congress may, therefore, enact a revenue tariff or a protective tariff or a prohibitory tariff in its discretion whenever the public interests or safety shall demand it.

The second act passed by Congress was a protective tariff bill. The preamble recited: "Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid upon goods, wares, and merchandise imported: Therefore, be it enacted," &c. This bill was introduced by Mr. Madison, who perhaps more than any other person took part in framing the provisions of the Constitution. In support of the bill Mr. Madison, among other things, said:

> The States that are most advanced in population and ripe for manufactures ought to have their particular interests attended to in some degree. While these States retained the power of regulations of trade they had the power to protect and cherish such institutions; by adopting the present Constitution they have thrown the exercise of this power into other hands; they must have done this with an expectation that those interests would not be neglected here. * * * Gentlemen who are opposed to giving sufficient encouragement to ship-building ought to recollect an argument that was considered of weight in the case of encouraging manufactures. It is certain that manufactures have been reared up by the fostering care of State Legislatures, displayed in the shape of protecting duties; but the people, by the adoption of this Constitution, have put it out of their power to continue them. * * * Those States, not being able to continue their encouragement, expect that we will attend to their policy and protect their citizens in the property they were led to acquire under the State regulations. If we disappoint them they will suffer more than is consistent with good policy.

Mr. President, the great ends sought are not alone to be accomplished by a tariff upon imports. We may enact laws to exempt our industries and labor from competition with the impoverished labor of other countries, and yet the remedy is incomplete. What is wanted now is a market for our surplus agricultural, mechanical, and manufactured products.

No law of Congress can secure to us such markets. It requires the exercise of the treaty-making power to accomplish these ends.

Instead of paying enormous subsidies, as is the custom of Great Britain, to secure foreign markets, we chiefly relinquish the duties imposed upon one of the prime necessities of life—more so than tea or coffee, which have been added to the free-list—for there is scarcely a man, woman, or child who is not a consumer of sugar. We are to receive as an equivalent therefor an exemption of many of our important products from the duties now imposed upon them, and we open the door for an annually increasing market abroad.

Many of the most ardent protectionists in the United States are advocates of the policy and wisdom of placing sugar with tea and coffee, upon the free-list, without obtaining any equivalent therefor. By the negotiation of treaties we secure advantages to our foreign trade, with all its surroundings, which no legislation of Congress can afford.

Mr. President, it is evident to my mind, or, as Mr. Webster once said on the floor of the Senate, "I see, or I think I see, * * * it may be an illusion, but, if it be an illusion, it appears to me with all the brightness of noonday," * * * that there are vast probabilities in the future of the Republic if the policy inaugurated in the proposed treaties shall become the permanent policy of the Government. Close commercial relations with all the South American states and with other countries, and a constantly increasing foreign trade commensurate with our needs, our coastwise traffic extending from Portland in Maine through the gates which in the near future will be opened between the two oceans, and also around the cape to Portland in Oregon and the harbors in Alaska, with a ready market for all our surplus products thus assured, the great commercial city of the State of New York will become the most important mart of trade and traffic in the world.

New empires will be carved out of the regions yet within our limits, each vying in enterprise and production with the older States.

Mr. President, this is no sketch of the fancy, but points to realities within our grasp; and when we shall have reached these desirable results, with a Constitution not violated, but adhered to with unswerving fidelity and with a patriotic purpose to achieve the great ends designed by its framers so nearly accomplished, our country will realize in full fruition the picture drawn by one of the best of poets, while dwelling upon the exalted statesmanship of the past and contemplating the auspicious promises for the future of the Republic:

Great were the hearts and strong the minds
Of those who framed, in high debate,
The immortal league of love which binds
Our fair, broad empire, State to State.

And ever hallowed be the hour
When, as the auspicious work was done,
A nation's gift—the sword of power—
Was given to glory's unstained son.

* * * *

Wide as our own free race increase,
Wide shall they stretch the elastic chain,
And bind, in everlasting peace,
State after State—a mighty train.

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator will permit me now, I will ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. LAPHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator referred to some treaty that was pending where its term of existence was fixed at seven years. I wish to ask the Senator from New York whether, in his opinion, the President of the United States and the Senate would have the power, should that treaty be ratified, at the termination of seven years to continue the treaty for seven years or for twenty years longer without the consent of the House of Representatives?

Mr. LAPHAM. They would clearly have the discretion to do it, even without the consent of the other House; but I do not believe that it would be continued without asking the consent of the House, as it was provided that the consent of the House should be given to its original enactment. There is no difficulty upon these questions, as I have shown. The legislation of Congress has always been furnished and always will be. Respect will be paid to the action of the treaty-making power, and is sure to be. It will not be treated lightly, will not be scoffed at, will not be derided, will not be belittled, but will be treated as the exercise of one of the great fundamental powers of the Government—a power more important in a national point of view as respects our foreign intercourse than the legislative power given to Congress, as I have shown by the voice of all authority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. I venture to propose that it be referred to the Committee on Finance, although I do not know but that we shall hereafter have no occasion for that committee—only the Committee on Foreign Relations and the State Department—and may get rid of the Committee on Finance and also the Secretary of the Treasury. I will move, however, to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall desire when the Senate is a little more at leisure to be heard on the question of referring it to the Committee on Finance. I can see very naturally why the Senator should wish his own bantling to be in the hands of his own nursing. It needs that attention, I think, from the Senator or somebody else. At the same time before it goes to the Committee on Finance I should like to be heard upon it, and I move that its further consideration be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator desires to address the Senate upon it I have no objection to a postponement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution is accordingly postponed.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to know where the pending order is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. There is a matter on the Calendar which was debated quite fully the other day and the report read, a bill for the relief of the Newton bank. A vote was about being taken but there was considerable doubt whether there was a quorum present, and accordingly it went over to stand at the head of the Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that that may be taken up now, saying that if it will require any further debate I shall withdraw the request.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER], who I do not see in his seat, took some interest in that question, and it is very possible that it may give rise to debate. I see that the Senator is here now.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Michigan if he desires to discuss further the Newton National Bank matter, which went over the other day just before the adjournment?

Mr. CONGER. I think it would be well to discuss it some more. At least it would be very gratifying to me to hear some response to what I suggested before.

Mr. HOAR. Then I withdraw the request.

Mr. CULLOM. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is before the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. In accordance with the notice I gave on Monday, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 8, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. FREDERICK D. POWER, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ADDITIONAL ESTIMATES, WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting additional estimates from the Secretary of War of appropriations for the erection of a gun factory, improving the Missouri River, Missouri River Commission, the Frankfort arsenal at Philadelphia, Pa., &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PETITION.

On motion of Mr. ROSECRANS, by unanimous consent leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the petition of Machinists and Blacksmiths' Union, No. 2, of Detroit, Mich.

FREMONT, ELKHORN AND MISSOURI VALLEY RAILROAD.

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 7329) granting the right of way to the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad Company across the Fort Robinson military reservation, in the State of Nebraska.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the State of Nebraska, are hereby granted the right of way, one hundred feet in width, for their said railroad across and through the Fort Robinson military reservation, located in said State of Nebraska, not to interfere with any buildings or improvements thereon, and the location thereof to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Has this measure been reported from any committee of the House?

Mr. VALENTINE. I will state in response to the gentleman from Indiana that this bill was before the Committee on Military Affairs, and was directed by the committee to be reported favorably to the House. It was in the hands of my colleague [Mr. LAIRD] for that purpose. Owing, however, to the recent accident which has detained him from the House, the report has not yet been made. There is every reason for the passage of the bill. I saw the Lieutenant-General of the Army, General Sheridan, myself in reference to it, and am informed by him that it is the desire of the Department to have it passed, as there are many reasons in favor of its passage and none against it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is limited, I believe, to the right of way only?

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir; limited to the right of way; and the location is to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VALENTINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MADISON R. CALVERT.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4273) for the relief of Madison R. Calvert.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Madison R. Calvert, an assistant paymaster in the United States

Navy, the sum of $501, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse him for a like amount stolen from his paymaster's safe on the United States steamer Mayflower, and made good by him; the said relief being recommended by the Paymaster-General of the Navy.

Mr. REAGAN. If this measure will give rise to no discussion, I shall not object to its present consideration.

Mr. ELLIS. It will not lead to any discussion, I am satisfied.

Mr. RANDALL. Has this been reported by any committee of the House?

Mr. ELLIS. It is unanimously reported by the Committee of Claims of the House.

The facts in connection with the matter, I will state briefly, are that this money was stolen from the claimant when in charge of the safe of the paymaster and was lost without any fault of his own. It was, according to the evidence in the case, deposited in a rickety safe furnished by the Government to which there were two or three keys, only one of which was furnished to him. The matter was examined into by the naval board, and at the moment the theft was discovered the claimant promptly made good the loss out of his own private means. The Paymaster-General has given the opinion that Mr. Calvert, the claimant, who was the assistant in charge, was not at all to blame. He made good the loss at once. In addition to this it is also a fact that he is on shore duty, and has been for several years, at a salary of $80 a month. He is in need of the money, and the bill ought to be passed for his benefit.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAJ. WILLIAM LUDLOW.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the permission granted to Maj. William Ludlow, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to accept a civil position in the service of the city of Philadelphia, without forfeiture of his military commission, until the 1st day of April, 1885, by the provisions of a joint resolution approved February 28, 1883, is hereby extended for the period of one year: Provided, however, That the said Ludlow shall not receive from the United States any pay or allowance whatever during said period.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. Res. 309) was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I now call for the regular order.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the gentleman to yield for a request that a letter in connection with the subject be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. REAGAN. I am willing to yield for that purpose.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask, then, that the letter which I send to the desk be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, December 19, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 16th instant, stating that Maj. William Ludlow, Corps of Engineers, was elected by the city council of Philadelphia chief engineer of the water department; that his commission has one more year to run; that he has entered upon important municipal work, and that a change in the general management of it would seriously interfere with the speedy completion of the work; and inclosing, for my views thereon, a draught of a joint resolution, which you state you propose offering in the House of Representatives at an early day, extending for the period of one year the permission granted by the joint resolution approved February 28, 1883, to Major Ludlow to accept a civil position in the service of the city of Philadelphia without a forfeiture of his military commission.

In reply I beg to inform you that the matter was referred to the Chief of Engineers, who reports that for the reasons set forth in your communication no objection is made by him to the continuation of Major Ludlow for an additional year upon the duties in which he is now engaged.

As the draught of the proposed resolution embodies the same conditions as to pay and allowances as that of the joint resolution approved February 28, 1883, no objection is urged to it by this Department.

The draught referred to is herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. HENRY H. BINGHAM,
House of Representatives.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. REAGAN. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The House, as the regular order, resumes the consideration of the unfinished business coming over from the last adjournment, being the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of interstate commerce, and to regulate such commerce. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS]. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the amendment the following:
"Provided, however, That the commissioners herein provided for shall not be appointed until the 5th of March, 1885."

The question being taken on the adoption of the amendment, there were—ayes 71, noes 12.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas as amended.

Mr. REAGAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas is of some length, and is printed in the RECORD of this morning. To save the time of reading, the substance of it might be stated.

The SPEAKER. It is the amendment offered yesterday afternoon by the gentleman from Kansas providing for the appointment of a commission.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment as amended, there were—ayes 65, noes 79.

Mr. PERKINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 45 members voting therefor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment on which we are to vote be again read.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I object.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 96, nays 126, not voting 101; as follows:

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, with Mr. PARKER, on the Reagan bill.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, with Mr. KEAN, on the Reagan bill. If present, Mr. JONES would vote "ay" and Mr. KEAN would vote "no."

Mr. KEAN. I desire to say that I understood the pair just announced between myself and Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, was only for yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that on the notice of the pair it is not limited to any particular time.

Mr. KEAN. It was only for the remainder of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. It will be withdrawn. The Chair will state to gentlemen on the floor that they will prevent much confusion at the Clerk's desk if they will withdraw their pairs or notify the Clerk when they have expired.

Mr. WELLBORN. My colleague from Texas [Mr. MILLS] is kept from the House by serious sickness in his family. If present, he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 7874) making additional appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I give notice that I will call this bill up for consideration to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. KEIFER. I reserve all points of order on this bill.

The SPEAKER. All points of order are reserved by the gentleman from Ohio.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of interstate commerce, and to regulate such commerce.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the substitute proposed for the bill by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I simply wish to say that I have taken the ideas of this substitute from an editorial in the Chicago Tribune of about the 19th of December last—an editorial remarkably conservative and just.

The SPEAKER. Debate has been closed.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I am aware of that; but I wanted to get this explanation in so that it might not be supposed I am "stealing the thunder" of other people—adopting their ideas without giving them proper credit.

The SPEAKER. The substitute proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] has not been read. It will be read if the gentleman so desires.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I do.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, shall appoint five commissioners, to be styled commissioners of interstate commerce, whose salaries shall be $6,000 per annum each, and whose duties shall be to hear complaints of shippers, and who shall make annual reports each fiscal year to the President of the United States, and for whom sufficient office-room shall be furnished by the Secretary of the Interior, and who shall have a clerk at the annual salary of $3,000, and an assistant clerk at the annual salary of $2,000, and a messenger at a salary of $75 per month.

"SEC. 2. That said commissioners shall report, so that it may be submitted to the Forty-ninth Congress in printed form upon the day of its assembling and organization, the propriety of requiring from all railroad companies engaged in carrying merchandise as interstate-commerce carriers publicity of all rates; ample public notice of change of rates; publicity and uniformity of all rebates, contracts with shippers for rates or rebates to be in writing and open to public inspection and the inspection of officials; publicity and uniformity of the accounts and reports of all interstate railroads and of interstate business of all other railroads; regular and unreserved reports of earnings and expenses, with penalties for falsification; no concessions in rates to large shippers, except to such as represent the actual merchandise saving in the expense of hauling large shipments over small shipments, such concessions to be in writing and invariably made known to the public; every pool or combination between interstate railroads or railroads doing an interstate business to be made in public, and their terms posted at every point interested."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. As I have already indicated, the points upon which my substitute proposes the commission shall report are taken from an editorial in the Chicago Tribune——

Mr. REAGAN. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I know that.

The question being taken on the adoption of the substitute of Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, there were—ayes 37, nays 87.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, instead of making at this time the point that no quorum has voted, I will call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 13 voting in favor thereof.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I make the point that no quorum has voted. This is an important proposition, and it ought to be voted upon by a full House.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. REAGAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 133.

So the substitute of Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, was not agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. REAGAN. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. At the proper time I desire to make a motion to recommit the bill with instructions——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that right now under the rules.

Mr. HEPBURN. I make the motion which I ask the Clerk to read. It is the motion as printed, for information of the House, in the RECORD of this morning, except that I have inserted the words "with or without amendment."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HEPBURN moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce with instructions to report the following bill, with or without amendment, as a substitute at an early day, and when so reported the said substitute shall occupy the same status for consideration as the bill now being considered:

"A bill to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and to regulate such commerce.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled——

The SPEAKER. If the reading be called for, the proposed bill of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] as already printed in the RECORD of to-day must be read.

Mr. HEPBURN. If I may be permitted to occupy a moment, I can state the special features of the proposed bill.

Mr. REAGAN. If no one else objects I do not object to permitting the gentleman from Iowa to state without argument the substance of his bill in lieu of having it read.

The SPEAKER. The bill is quite long, and, instead of demanding that it be read, the gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to make a brief statement of the contents of the measure. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, the bill which I have made a part of my motion is the bill reported by the Committee on Commerce, with three or four amendments. The eighth section is amended so as to provide for a commission of nine persons, one from each judicial circuit. The tenth section is amended so that the reports of the commission shall in all subsequent legal proceedings stand as prima facie true. The eleventh and thirteen sections are also amended by the insertion of similar words. With these exceptions, the bill is the same as that reported by the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce with the proposed instructions as read. [Having put the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 55 voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 92, nays 132, not voting 99; as follows:

During the roll-call the following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. SENEY with Mr. VALENTINE, on all questions, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. MORRISON with Mr. HISCOCK, until further notice.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the bill under consideration because I approve of the majority of the provisions contained in it. It strikes at abuses which ought to be corrected. But I am opposed to the provisions of the first section of the bill, relating to the transportation of passengers, as in my judgment there is no constitutional power in Congress to so legislate. The power to regulate commerce refers to and includes merchandise, the commodity transported, and has no reference to the vehicle, or carriage, or vessel in which it is transported. The carrying of passengers, in my judgment, can not by any fair interpretation be included within the power. I am also opposed to the clause restricting railroads to a charge of but 3 cents per mile for passengers. Some roads can better afford to carry passengers at 2 cents per mile than some others can for 5 cents per mile. But I vote for the bill as an experiment in the right direction, not free from doubts, but with hopes of beneficial results to all interests.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on ordering the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 161, nays 75, not voting 87; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BAGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. BARR. I object.

The Clerk then recapitulated the names of those voting.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. DORSHEIMER with Mr. THOMPSON, on the Reagan bill. If present, Mr. THOMPSON would vote "ay," Mr. DORSHEIMER "no."

Mr. GIBSON with Mr. REESE, on the Reagan bill, for this day. Mr. GIBSON would vote "ay," Mr. REESE "no."

Mr. FOLLETT with Mr. BURLEIGH, until further notice.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am paired, I believe, with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON]. Except for that I would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to reconsider——

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill has not yet been agreed to.

Mr. PETERS. I ask to amend the title of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Did not the adoption of the substitute carry with it the title?

The SPEAKER. The title is always the last thing adopted in the consideration of bills.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I shall call the previous question upon the adoption of the title.

Mr. PETERS. I ask to amend the title by adding to it the words "and for other purposes."

Mr. REAGAN. Instead of the title of the original bill, "to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and to regulate such commerce," I move the adoption of the substitute which the House has agreed to, namely, to regulate interstate commerce, and to prohibit unjust discrimination by common carriers; and on that I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to regulate interstate commerce, and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

Mr. REAGAN. Upon that I demand the previous question.

Mr. PETERS. I did not yield the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. I am on the floor myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas proposed to amend the title, which is the title that was reported to the House by the committee with the original bill. Thereupon the gentleman from Texas obtained the floor and proposed as a substitute the title which has been read, and on that demanded the previous question.

Mr. PETERS. I ask to be heard upon my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has demanded the previous question upon his motion. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. PETERS. I ask the gentleman from Texas to allow me a few moments. [Renewed cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. PETERS. I now propose my amendment as a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kansas that he proposed the amendment in the first instance, and then the gentleman from Texas took the floor and proposed a substitute for his amendment and the entire title, and immediately demanded the previous question.

Mr. PETERS. I now offer my amendment as a substitute for that of the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. But the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. PETERS. But I was on the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state again that the gentleman from Kansas moved to amend the original title, whereupon the gentleman from Texas moved a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas, and suggested a title for the bill. On that the previous question was demanded and ordered. The only question now is on the adoption of the title proposed by the gentleman from Texas as a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from Kansas.

The substitute was agreed to.

The title as amended was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I want to say that this is a fitting celebration for the 8th day of January.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. This will require a two-thirds vote.

The question was taken; and on a divison there were—ayes 40, noes 59.

A MEMBER. No quorum.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let us have tellers.

The SPEAKER. Some gentleman on the left of the Chair having made the point of order that no quorum had voted the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND and Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri, were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 90.

So (no further count being demanded) the motion to dispense with the morning hour was not agreed to.

SARANAC RIVER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from Lieut. Col. H. M. Roberts, Corps of Engineers, of results of survey of the mouth of the Saranac River, Plattsburg, N. Y.; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

CONTESTED ELECTION—CRAIG VS. SHELLEY.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. I call up the contested-election case of George H. Craig vs. Charles M. Shelley, Fourth Congressional district of Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolutions reported by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Charles M. Shelley was not elected a Representative to the Forty-eighth Congress from the fourth district of Alabama, and is not entitled to a seat in said Congress.

Resolved, That George H. Craig was elected to the Forty-eighth Congress from the fourth district of Alabama, and is entitled to a seat in said Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DAVIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I desire to make a statement in regard to this case before it is acted on by the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. Does the gentleman propose to raise the question of consideration?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes, sir; and I do it on this ground: There is a minority report in this case. There was a dissenting opinion on the part of Judge BENNETT, of North Carolina. That gentleman is now at home sick. He wrote out a report and had it ready to be filed. The contestee, Mr. Shelley, is also absent. Therefore I do not think it is fair and right that this case should be called up at this particular time when both the contestee and the gentleman who prepared the minority report are absent and can not be heard.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky raise the question of consideration?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes, sir; I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. HART. Is not the contestee, Mr. Shelley, in the city?

Mr. ROBERTSON. If he is in the city I do not know it. I do not think he is.

Mr. PETTIBONE. The gentleman from North Carolina had six months in which to file his report.

Mr. REED. The trouble about Mr. Shelley's case is not that he is not in the city but that he is in the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. RORERTSON. Is Mr. Shelley here now? If he is in the House he has got here in a very short time, because I did not know it. [Laughter.] Does the gentleman from Maine say that Mr. Shelley is here in person?

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBERTSON addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration is not debatable.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman from Kentucky will think the thing over I think he will understand it.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. VALENTINE. Admitting that the question is not debatable I think the other side of the question should be stated before the vote is taken. I think that is but fair. The gentleman from North Carolina has had more than six months to file the dissenting report, and he is the only dissenting member of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not permit the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBERTSON] to proceed with any debate after he raised the question of consideration. The gentleman rose, the Chair supposed, to make an appeal to the gentleman from Missouri not to press the consideration of the report to-day. The question is, Will the House now consider the report of the Committee on Elections?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 115, noes 27.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 11 members voting therefor.

So the House determined to proceed with the consideration of the report of the Committee on Elections.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. I believe there is no member of the Committee on Elections who desires to make a speech in this case. In reply to what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBERTSON] has said about the case being called up prematurely in the absence of Mr. Shelley, I will state that this report was made at the last session of Congress, and its consideration has been delayed from day to day at the request of Mr. Shelley and Mr. BENNETT. I agreed to that with the understanding that at the beginning of the session of the House after the holidays the case should be disposed of.

All I have to say about the case is simply this: The official return made to the secretary of state of Alabama gave Mr. Shelley about 2,500 majority. But in order to secure this majority thirty-six voting precincts in that Congressional district were rejected. In a word, over 8,000 votes that had been returned for Mr. Craig were not counted.

These votes were rejected on technical grounds, such as that the polls did not open at 9 o'clock in the morning as required by law, and in other cases that the poll-list was not signed.

Mr. Craig gave notice of contest and took testimony; Mr. Shelley paid no attention to the contest, or but very little. The testimony shows that in, I believe, twenty-five or twenty-eight of the thirty-six townships that were rejected the election was held according to law and that most of the forms prescribed by law were complied with. At least the testimony shows this: that the people in those precincts attempted to have an honest and a fair election and that the votes were cast. Our conclusion is in accordance with the decision of the supreme court of Alabama, and in accordance with the rule on which we proceed in the Committee on Elections in all these cases.

If the testimony shows that Mr. Craig received a majority of votes, why of course he is entitled to the certificate and a seat in this House. The testimony clearly showed, notwithstanding all the forms of law were not complied with, that these votes were honestly cast, and I believe they should be honestly counted. And counting about twenty-eight of the rejected townships for Mr. Craig, he has a majority of something over 3,000. As has been stated, this was the almost unanimous opinion of the Committee on Elections. As I have said, I believe no member wishes to speak upon this question. If I am mistaken in this, I would like to be so informed.

Mr. PETTIBONE. No; nobody wants to discuss it. We are all united in opinion, and ready to vote.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. Then I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolutions reported by the Committee on Elections.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on agreeing to the resolutions, it was declared that "the ayes seemed to have it."

Mr. NICHOLLS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 2 members voting in favor thereof.

So the resolutions reported by the Committee on Elections were adopted.

Mr. HART moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE H. CRAIG then presented himself, and was duly qualified as a Representative from the fourth district of Alabama by taking the oath prescribed by law.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills for the erection of public buildings, in accordance with the special order of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. No question of consideration can be raised. The motion of the gentleman from Indiana can only be opposed by voting against it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I give notice that if this motion be voted down, I shall call up from the Speaker's table the Mexican war pension bill.

Mr. SINGLETON. And I give notice that I shall endeavor to call up the bill for the erection of a Congressional Library building.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the House has refused to dispense with the morning hour, and until that is done a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is not in order.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Under the special order made in this case a motion to go into Committee of the Whole, I submit to the Chair, is in order now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not undertake to decide the point positively without looking at the order.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I think the Chair on a former occasion has so ruled.

The SPEAKER. Upon an examination of the order made by the House on the 7th of April last, the Chair finds that the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] may be made even before the morning hour has been occupied or dispensed with. The order made by the House in relation to business of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is somewhat different from the order made on motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in relation to bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Yes, sir; it is different.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Indiana that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills in relation to the erection of public buildings under the order made on the 7th of April last.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 61, noes 69.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. Would it be appropriate to ask the gentleman from Indiana how many bills this order embraces?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. It is not appropriate now.

Mr. RANDALL. Thirty-five, I understand.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 49 voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 102, not voting 111; as follows:

YEAS—110.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. MCMILLIN, Mr. STORM, Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, and others objected.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. SUMNER, of California, with Mr. STONE, for the balance of this day.

Mr. FERRELL with Mr. FIEDLER, for this day.

Mr. LEWIS with Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, on this question.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, on all political questions, for the remainder of this day.

Mr. HOBLITZELL with Mr. MCCORMICK, on all political questions, for the remainder of this day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. KEIFER. I make the point of order that that motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not care to discuss it further than to state that a motion was made and carried by which the House decided to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering such measures as were involved in a particular special order. After that motion was carried I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is not in order for the Chair to entertain any motion of any kind, especially the motion to fix a time to which the House shall adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the reading of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if this were an original question the Chair would probably have some doubt as to whether the motion to take a recess, or to adjourn, or to fix a day to which the House shall adjourn, would be in order after the House had resolved to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The fifth paragraph of Rule XVI is as follows:

A motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, a motion to adjourn, and to take a recess shall always be in order, and the hour at which the House adjourns shall be entered on the Journal.

During the last Congress, while the gentleman who now makes the point of order was presiding in the House, this same question was raised on a motion to adjourn, which the House will observe is, under the rule, put upon precisely the same footing as a motion to take a recess, or to fix a day to which the House shall adjourn, and against which a similar point of order was raised. The point of order was overruled by the Chair and the motion was entertained after the House had resolved to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And while the Chair would have great doubt as to whether such a motion could be entertained if it were an original question, after the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had been adopted, the Chair thinks it is better to have uniformity in the rulings on the subject, and therefore overrules the point of order. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to be heard further?

Mr. KEIFER. I only desire to observe that while I am not familiar with the exact circumstances under which that question arose, I think that there is a distinction between the two cases. But perhaps the Chair is right and I am very thankful to it for following the precedent set.

Mr. RANDALL (from his seat). That is very gracefully done.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 57, noes 58.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. We had better have tellers.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Let us have the yeas and nays at once.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 48 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 41, nays 163, not voting 119, as follows:

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2449) to provide for the distribution of the statutes of the United States and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to designated incorporated bodies, institutions, and associations within the several States and Territories, to report it without amendment. I ask for its immediate consideration, as it relates to the distribution of documents and should be acted upon.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It requires the Secretary of the Interior to furnish to incorporated bodies, institutions, and associations to be designated to him by Senators of the several States respectively, and by the Representatives in Congress, and by the Delegate from each Territory, one bound copy of the statutes of the United States enacted by the Forty-eighth Congress and each succeeding Congress, and of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for that Congress and each future Congress, in the manner provided in sections 501 and 502 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the distribution of other books and public documents therein mentioned.

Mr. MORGAN. I think we ought to amend the bill so as to furnish a copy of these papers, particularly the statutes, to the supreme courts of the Indian Territory, the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Creek Nations. Those tribes have supreme courts well organized; they publish their decisions in very excellent form, and they are learned opinions, worthy of the bench in any part of the country. I attempted, some sessions ago, at the instance of a gentleman of the bar of the Creek Indian country, who is a full-blooded Indian, but a very accomplished lawyer, to have a similar provision made, and introduced a bill to that effect, which I believe the Senate passed, but at all events it never became a law. This being a good opportunity, I suggest to the Senator who reported the bill whether that would not be a good amendment to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill does not increase or change the number of persons receiving public documents. It follows the language of the law. It simply provides that with the other documents that are distributed under the existing law a copy of the United States Statutes at Large and of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall be sent. So I do not think the amendment the Senator suggests would answer the purpose. The bill does not increase, to any extent whatever, the number of persons to whom documents are sent. It only provides for sending them two other documents which they do not now receive.

I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator if he desires to frame it; but if he wishes to increase the number of persons entitled to documents, this bill does not do that; it does not change the law in that respect.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course if my amendment would not be effectual I do not wish to disturb the manner and form of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to say also that this measure is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and is very much desired. Indeed, it seems to be absolutely necessary now, since the Statutes at Large are printed at the Public Printing Office and the RECORD is printed there, that these documents should be furnished in this way by the public authorities.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VESSELS OF GREELY RELIEF EXPEDITION.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report back favorably the bill (S. 2379) to authorize the transfer of one of the vessels of the Greely relief expedition to the Treasury Department for a revenue-cutter and the retention of the other two for use in the Navy, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. If it leads to no debate I shall not object. If it leads to debate, I must object.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. If it leads to any debate, I shall withdraw it.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to reserve the right to object if the bill leads hereafter to discussion, except the Senator's explanation; I do not object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks leave to object to the bill at any stage. Is there objection to that? The Chair hears none. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and is hereby, directed to transfer to the Treasury Department, for use as a revenue-cutter in the waters of Alaska, one of the vessels of the late Greely relief expedition, and place the other two for use in the Navy, as surveying vessels or otherwise.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I will state that under the laws which exist at present the Secretary of the Navy is compelled to offer these vessels at public sale. I will read an extract from a letter from C. L. Hooper, captain United States Marine Service, addressed to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. The captain says:

For a number of years our vessels have been called upon to cruise in the Arctic regions, but no provision has been made to furnish us with suitable vessels. Our little cutters are all right for the purpose for which they were intended, but are unfit for the work which we now have to do on the coast of Alaska, being entirely too small and not sufficiently strong in their build. The Corwin, a little vessel intended for service on the Columbia River, has been five successive years cruising from May until October in the waters of Behring Sea and the Arctic Ocean; and this without any special fitting other than a thin sheathing of oak to protect the pine plank from chafe by the ice. She has accommodation, by packing close, for thirty-seven persons; but almost every year it is found necessary, in order to relieve persons actually in distress, to take on board many (sometimes as high as forty) in addition to her regular complement. Of course the condition of so many people confined in such small quarters is very bad, and there is constant danger of disease breaking out. Therefore there is nothing to do but end the voyage and return to San Francisco.

Then her capacity for carrying provisions is entirely too small. It is criminal to send a vessel into the Arctic Ocean to take her chances in the ice and run the risks our vessels run each year without sufficient food on board to sustain life during the winter should she become fast.

The coal capacity of the Corwin is also entirely too small, and going out of the Arctic to coal several times each summer occupies a good deal of time which can be poorly spared.

If the Revenue-Marine Service is to be required to send a vessel into the Arctic Ocean each year to protect the interests of commerce and enforce the laws, a suitable vessel should be furnished for the purpose. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the relative merits of the Bear and Thetis to decide which would be the more suitable. It is probable that either would answer the purpose. The Alert is perhaps a little larger than we need.

This subject was referred to the Secretary of the Navy, and a letter was received from him this morning, which is in these words:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 9, 1884.

SIR: In response to your letter of January 8, inclosing a copy of Senate bill No. 2379, in relation to the vessels of Greely relief expedition, I have the honor to reply that in the annual report of this Department of December 1, 1884, the following opinion is expressed:

"The joint resolution of February 13, 1884, directed the sale of the vessels which might be purchased for the Greely relief expedition. The sale has not yet been made, and it is recommended that the Thetis and Bear be retained for surveying vessels, or to cruise in the waters of Alaska, or for use in the training service."

The views above expressed are confirmed by further consideration of the subject. It is very desirable that the Thetis and Bear should be retained for that peculiar service of the Government for which they are specially and admirably adapted.

Very respectfully,

W. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. J. D. CAMERON,
Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

From this letter it will be seen that one of the vessels will not be requisite for the service of the Navy, and it can be very readily transferred to the Revenue Marine. I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to supplement the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania by stating what I understand to be the true condition of affairs respecting these vessels. The law, it will be remembered, authorized their purchase for a special purpose, and that purpose having been accomplished, the Secretary of the Navy was required to immediately dispose of the vessels. It is well known that owing to the very small demand for vessels of this class, or indeed of any class, at the present time, it would be impossible perhaps to sell them for anything like the value that they may have to the Government for other purposes. If I understand the Senator correctly, the bill simply authorizes the Secretary of the Navy either to sell the vessels or to retain them in the service, as is deemed to be for the best interests of the country.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The bill will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania if it would not be wiser to use the word "authorized," so that if an offer should be made for one of these vessels the Secretary of the Navy would have full authority to sell it, or it could be diverted to the purpose spoken of if it was found to be available. The bill leaves him no option whatever; it simply directs him.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection whatever to his being authorized to retain the two vessels in the service, but the other one, I think, should be directly transferred to the Treasury Department for the use of the Revenue-Marine Service. I will so modify the bill.

Mr. MCPHERSON. While the Senator from Pennsylvania is preparing an amendment, I should like to make an inquiry of him as to what action has been taken by the Government touching the vessel which was presented to us by Great Britain. I believe the bill of the Senator from Pennsylvania includes that too. I have heard it stated somewhere that it was the purpose of the Government to tender it back to the Government of Great Britain accompanied with thanks. I do not know but what we may complicate the situation if it should be the desire or purpose of the Government to send the ship back to Great Britain, and I ask whether we should not be legislating in such a way that it would be impossible to do that? I ask for information, as I am not thoroughly advised upon that question.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. In reply to the Senator from New Jersey I will state that from the letter of the Secretary of the Navy received this morning I am led to believe that he is compelled under the law to offer all these vessels for sale, including the one received from Great Britain. Whether there has been anything done by Congress relative to the return of that vessel to Great Britain with the thanks of Congress, I do not know; it has not been done since my return to the Senate; but I will put in an amendment, at the suggestion of the Senator, which I think will remedy his objection. The bill would read as amended:

That the Secretary of the Navy be, and is hereby, directed to transfer to the Treasury Department, for use as a revenue-cutter in the waters of Alaska, one of the vessels of the late Greely relief expedition, and is hereby authorized to place the other two for use in the Navy as surveying vessels or otherwise.

So that he need not place the two there unless he sees fit. I think the amendment covers the Senator's objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6, after the word "and," it is proposed to insert the words "is hereby authorized to;" so as to read:

And is hereby authorized to place the other two for use in the Navy as surveying vessels or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LUTHER STATUE ASSOCIATION.

Mr. INGALLS. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4088) to incorporate the Luther Statue Association, to erect and maintain a monument or statue in memory of Martin Luther in the District of Columbia, to report it with the recommendation that it do pass; and at the request of the gentlemen interested I will ask the indulgence of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the bill be now considered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask one question of the Senator reporting it, and that is why this incorporation can not be brought into existence under the general laws of the District of Columbia without this special legislation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Strictly the Chair must ask if there be objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to it unless that explanation can be given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Chair will allow debate to go on by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. The general law provides a limit to the powers of a corporation. In this case the Lutherans of the United States have erected a statue on the point of church property fronting the Thomas Circle, and the land is a part of a point of the church property on which the Lutheran church is. Under the general law there is a limitation of the continuance of the corporate powers, which would make it necessary to watch and have new laws passed. All they desire is that there shall be a number of gentlemen of that denomination who shall succeed perpetually to the control and keeping of this statue.

Mr. COCKRELL. Five thousand feet is the amount of land they are to have by the bill. Is not that not much more than is occupied by the statue?

Mr. CONGER. But the bill was introduced before the site was selected and before the statue was brought to this country from Germany. Since that time the Lutheran Memorial Church has agreed to donate and as far as it can do so has donated the little point of land fronting the Thomas Circle between Vermont avenue and Fourteenth street. The statue has arrived here and been erected and placed there, and the amount of land is limited to whatever of that little point has been given by the church association.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ought there not to be a limitation in the bill? I know where the statue is, and I have no objection in the world to the bill if you limit it to the actual amount of land used there, but do not make it sufficient to cover a square or block and exempt it from taxation.

Mr. CONGER. The report of the House committee says:

The only power given is to erect and keep up the monument, to procure 5,000 square feet or less of ground in the District of Columbia whereon to build the monument, and to exempt the land so held and the monument, &c., thereon from taxation. But the proposed site, the church lot, is already exempt from taxation.

Except that the bill has come from the House, and the gentlemen composing this association are very anxious to have their organization so that they can perfect their arrangements, there would be no objection to limiting the bill as to the amount of property that may be held.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the only point in the world. It ought not to be 5,000 feet, which would cover a whole block of land they may acquire to be exempt from taxation for all time to come.

Mr. CONGER. If the Senator remembers that little point——

Mr. COCKRELL. I know where it is exactly.

Mr. CONGER. The street bounds it on two sides, and the church on the other. There can be no encroachment upon any other land.

Mr. GARLAND. Let the last section of the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will report for information the last section of the bill, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the lands acquired and held by said body corporate, and the statue erected thereon, and all the improvements and appurtenances thereto, shall be entirely exempt from taxation, and shall not be chargeable or assessed for any purpose whatever.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to offer an amendment to the fourth section by putting in the usual proviso, that this act may be modified, repealed, or amended at any time Congress may see fit.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection except that the bill would have to go back to the House where it might not be reached this sesssion.

Mr. GARLAND. It is a very important matter, however, because the omission of such a proviso has given trouble in every one of these cases. It gives rise to a great deal of trouble, and I think if the Senator will reflect for a moment he will agree that it should be put in here, although it may occasion some delay.

Mr. CONGER. For every other denomination in the country we have passed such laws, and this is for a little piece of land not thirty feet on a side and twenty feet across the base. The statue having been already erected there, a very numerous denomination having contributed to its erection, and it being left in the hands of gentlemen of that denomination, and being so small a piece of land, it seems to me that the Senate might run the risk of passing the bill without sending it back to the House, where very probably it would not be reached this session. I hope the Senator will not insist on his amendment, although I have no objection to it in the world except that it will cause delay.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] has already indicated some possible objection in the future or some difficulties that might arise in reference to the bill. It is the experience almost every day in this country that such acts give rise to trouble and confusion which w re not anticipated at the time of their passage. This is a safeguard that I think should be thrown around all such bills. I dislike very much to interfere in a matter the Senator from Michigan has so much at heart, but I think the amendment should be put on the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Is there any question but what Congress retains the power, if public occasion requires it, to alter, to amend, or repeal all such bills?

Mr. GARLAND. There is very great question, especially when intervening rights grow up or if in a subsequent transaction it should be undertaken to change or modify the status of the property involved. The right should be reserved at the time of the passage of the charter. I will state to the Senator from Michigan that in my experience and observation there is no question that has given rise to more serious controversies in the courts. I dislike to interfere with this matter at this time, but I think the amendment should be made.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator will bear in mind that this property is now, and will be until transferred under some agreement, actually in the occupancy of the church itself, exempt from all taxation, being a little point of land just large enough for the base and pedestal of the statue. Otherwise, if this right should not be given, it would be under the general laws exempt property. It seems to me there can be no risk about this little piece of land.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas moves an amendment which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 4:

Provided, That this act may be modified, repealed, or amended whenever Congress may see fit to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I will say that I would rather the amendment should be adopted than to have the bill go over and not have speedy consideration. Therefore, I do not object to it, hoping that it may be reached in the other House and passed there.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT ON APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC POLICY OF CONFEDERATE STATES EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent and other resolutions" are in order. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution which went over yesterday under objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] will first be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if in his opinion it be not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate a historical statement concerning the public policy of the executive department of the Confederate States during the late war of the rebellion, reported to have been lately filed in the War Department by General William T. Sherman.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have been requested by the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to let this lie over until Monday. I am quite willing to do so, but I ask unanimous consent that it may be laid before the Senate on Monday as of to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the consideration of this resolution be postponed until Monday next and that it may be laid before the Senate then on the call for resolutions. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. That does not make it a special order, but gives the same right to object then as now, so as to have it go over one day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution was introduced yesterday and objected to, and under the practice adopted by the Chair, with the acquiescence of the Senate, a resolution that is objected to and goes over one day is the next day laid before the Senate when the order of resolutions is reached. That has now been done. The unanimous consent the Senator from Connecticut asked for is that it be again laid before the Senate on Monday as of to-day with the same rights. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TESTS OF IRON AND STEEL.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of tests of iron and steel and other materials for industrial purposes, by Maj. F. H. Parker, commanding the Watertown arsenal, transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of War on the 3d of December, 1884, be printed, and that 3,500 additional copies be printed, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House, and 500 copies for the use of the War Department.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 8th instant approved and signed the act (S. 2393) to change the name of the Slater National Bank of North Providence, R. I.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. SLATER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 761, being House bill 181.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent ——

Mr. HOAR. What bill is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon.

Mr. WILSON. Before that is done I desire to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon will withhold his motion until the call for resolutions is gone through with. It will then be in order to move to take up the bill.

Mr. SLATER. Very well.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of the report of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company for the year 1884.

FORT GREENE.

Mr. SHEFFIELD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to report without unnecessary delay to the Senate whether any private person is in the possession and occupation of Fort Greene, in Newport, R. I., belonging to the United States, and, if so, under what authority does such person hold the same. Whether the said Fort Greene is of any present use to the Government of the United States, and, if not, will the United States probably have any future use for the said fort; and if there is no present or prospective use for the said fort, whether or not the same ought not to be sold, and the proceeds thereof be covered into the Treasury of the United States, and if the said Fort Greene is not of any present use to the United States but will probably be of use thereto hereafter, whether the said Fort Greene may not well be committed to the care and custody of the city of Newport, to be by the said city used as a public park until further action of Congress or of the Secretary of War is had in reference thereto.

FORFEITURE OF OREGON LAND GRANT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Concurrent and other resolutions are still in order. If there be no further resolutions that order is closed.

Mr. SLATER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 181.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon. This bill passed the Senate on the 6th of January. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] moved that the vote passing the bill be reconsidered.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask whether the Calendar should not be laid before the Senate before that motion is put?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar is before the Senate. The Chair regularly should have stated that the Calendar under Rule VIII was before the Senate after the call for resolutions was concluded.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon to withhold his motion for a few minutes. The bill for the relief of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., came before the Senate just before the holidays. The report was read; the bill was debated; and one Senator desired to make some further examination of the report. I think the bill would then have been disposed of and would now be disposed of very shortly, and if it is not disposed of the whole time of the Senate will have been wasted which was spent in considering it on that day. I am very desirous that the bill should be disposed of and passed if possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to state that debate on this motion is not in order, nor is debate on the motion to reconsider in order.

Mr. HOAR. I so understand the matter; but if the vote should be reconsidered then I suppose on reconsideration the bill would be open to debate as originally. I suppose that was the expectation of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. SLATER. I should like very much to accommodate the Senator from Massachusetts, but I think under the circumstances I ought not to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not open to debate except by unanimous consent. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon that the Senate now proceed to consider the motion to reconsider submitted by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to make a statement in regard to this motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent of the Senate to submit some remarks upon the motion. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. I think I ought to object under the circumstances.

Mr. MORGAN. I merely desire to make a statement which will occupy only a minute.

Mr. HOAR. Very well, then; I will not object.

Mr. MORGAN. That bill passed and I made the motion to reconsider the vote by which it was passed, not for the purpose of interfering with the bill or delaying any action upon it or for any other cause than this: The same question precisely was before the Senate on a conference report which has not yet been considered by the Senate, the two Houses having disagreed on the question. The committee of conference have reported, and I have not yet drawn the attention of the Senate to that report and asked them to take it up. That question ought to precede this. I made the motion to reconsider in order that I might have an opportunity to ascertain from Senators who voted against my amendment to the Oregon bill, and who had previously voted for that amendment to the other bill, whether they were influenced by the consideration that they had changed their opinion, or only by the fact that they supposed the amendment was not a necessary amendment under the existing state of facts on the Oregon bill. I have satisfied myself that some of the Senators at least who voted against the amendment took the ground that it was not a necessary amendment to that bill; that there was really practically no question in the Oregon case as between the holders of the bonds of the railroad company and the corporation or the Government of the United States.

Now, having satisfied myself, and being able to state that I am so satisfied, I propose to yield to the judgment of the Senate thus expressed, believing that the judgment of the Senate as so expressed by their vote was not a judgment against the merits of the amendment, but was a judgment against its practicability, or rather its being necessary upon this bill. I will therefore ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that I may withdraw my motion to reconsider. After the explanation I have made I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that I may withdraw my motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks leave to withdraw his motion to reconsider. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion is withdrawn. The bill stands passed with the amendments of the Senate. The Calendar, under Rule VIII, is before the Senate.

RIGHTS IN RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 1445) to provide for the settlement of the rights of the States and of the corporations and persons interested in any grant of lands in aid of railroads and canals which shall be declared forfeited by act of Congress was announced as first in order on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that that go over to the Calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. HOAR. What has become of the Newton National Bank bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not yet reached.

Mr. HOAR. I thought that was up before partly.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the bill announced from the Chair go over to the other Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama objects to the consideration of this bill; and it will be passed over and take its place under Rule IX.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF NEWTON, MASS.

The bill (S. 1331) making appropriation for the relief of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONGER. Is that under Rule VIII?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. The bill has been heretofore read and considered as in Committee of the Whole and the amendments reported agreed to. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Is it now to be considered under Rule VIII?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Now under Rule VIII.

Mr. CONGER. I think it ought to be considered under Rule IX, to give further opportunity of discussion and further opportunity of examination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan objects to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HOAR. I move to take up the bill for consideration at the present time notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan put a question the other day which might as well be answered now; it will take but one moment, if the Senate will give me its attention.

I can say that this whole case is in a nutshell. This is a bill authorizing the payment of interest to the First National Bank of Newton upon a claim against the Government. The teller of the bank and the cashier or teller in the United States subtreasury at Boston entered into a fraudulent arrangement by which certain property of the bank was delivered to this agent of the United States for the purpose of being exhibited to the examiners of the subtreasury to make the money in his hands apparently good.

After the transaction was discovered the United States seized these assets of the bank, which were interest-paying securities and cash, and $46,000 of them bonds of the United States bearing interest The Supreme Court of the United States thereupon held that the United States was liable for that property; that the transaction did not make any change of property whatever; that the fraudulent knowledge by the United States teller was the knowledge of the United States, and of course—I do not know that the court said that, but it is apparent to everybody—that the teller was no agent of the bank for any purpose of disposing of this property either in that way or any other. So there had been no agency on the part of the bank. The principal sum has been paid, but this property was withheld from the bank for a large number of years, leaving the bank to fail, and the stockholders to be responsible for its debts, under the general statute, to the extent of their stock.

The committee examined the whole matter; the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] made a very thorough, patient, and faithful examination of the precedents, and he found that the precedents were very numerous, nearly uniform, in favor of paying interest in such cases. I can not see how any Senator can hesitate as to the duty of the United States. Here it seized upon its own interest-bearing securities, kept them cautiously from its creditor for thirteen or fourteen years, got the benefit of the interest which was due, and did not pay it, though the original seizure was a tort. That would apply to the $46,000 of its own securities. The entire property was withheld from the bank—the securities and the cash. Its debts were running on upon which it was bound to pay interest. The Supreme Court of the United States in the decision quoted by the Senator from Tennessee declared on a similar case, which was sent to the Court of Claims with a view to ascertaining what was the customary policy of the Government in like cases, that an examination of the legislation of this country showed that it is the established policy of the United States to pay interest in all such cases. That is the whole story.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, there has been no answer to the statement I made the other day, which ought to preclude at once, if true, the passage of this bill. There is no pretense in the answer just attempted that there is over $46,000 of the securities that were drawing interest which would have inured to the benefit either of the Government or of the party. There is an appropriation here, I am told, of $350,000, if that is the amount named in the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the bill be read, that we may hear what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The bill will be read if the Senator from Michigan yields.

Mr. CONGER. I do yield, but this should not be taxed to my five minutes, and my time taken up in reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has voted to consider the bill, notwithstanding the objection, which relieves it from the five-minute rule.

Mr. CONGER. All right, then.

The Secretary read the bill as amended.

Mr. CONGER. The original claim, all told, was $371,000, as found by the court after litigation, and after the whole matter had been placed in the hands of the court to determine between the United States and this bank, or these claimants, whoever they were, what, if anything, was due from the Government to the bank or to the persons interested in the assets of the bank. The court rendered a judgment of $371,025. That judgment was rendered October 25, 1881. On that date whatever was due by the decision of the court to these parties was for the first time ascertained and liquidated at $371,025. The question of interest I have a right to assume was considered, whatever was due either in principal or interest or value—whatever the General Government was under any legal obligation to repay entered into this account, interest, damages, everything. There can be no denial of that on the record.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. Withholding interest in the case was put by the court distinctly on the ground of the peculiar phraseology of the act giving jurisdiction.

Mr. CONGER. Where is the record of that? It does not appear in the report; it does not appear anywhere. There is nothing to show but that the court either in the nature of damages or interest gave all that was demandable; and I may here say it is not the original owners of this property who come here for it now——

Mr. JACKSON. Will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir; I will yield all around.

Mr. JACKSON. I have the report of the decision of the court before me, and the court only gave judgment for the principal, which was the ascertained, fixed, and definite amount of the bank's assets that had been appropriated. There was no consideration of damages or of interest either, for under the statute the Court of Claims is not allowed to award interest except where the contract expressly stipulates for the payment of interest.

Mr. CONGER. That reads well, and the Senator is generally very accurate. What was the ascertained value of those assets? Their value with interest or their value without interest? Who shall tell us? The court's report does not tell, and the report of the committee does not tell, or whether, if not as interest, yet in the nature of damages for withholding this property the matter was not considered, the committee do not tell us.

Mr. JACKSON. They do tell, and so does the decision of the Court of Claims, that the judgment was for the fixed amount of principal which was claimed, allowing no interest and no damages.

Mr. CONGER. That may be; and if the Senator says so I suppose it is so. Then interest is not included in the judgment. But this was a matter of dispute between this Government and a bank. The agents of the Government proved unfaithful and false, and undertook to rob the Government. The cashier and one of the directors of the bank, having power in this matter to do what they did do, undertook to defraud the Government of the United States, and place themselves in jeopardy of being punished by the securities they gave to the officers of the United States being retained. They gave those securities with the chance of their being retained. There is no doubt about that. The subtreasurer of the United States, when the day of reckoning came, needed money in his hands to settle his accounts as subtreasurer, and he went to the cashier of this bank and he went to the principal managing director of this bank and he asked them to place in his hands money or its equivalent, that he might the next day make a showing to the examiners and satisfy the authorities of the United States that the subtreasury, with its accounts, with its money, with its payments, with its bills receivable and bills payable, and all its transactions, balanced even, and that he was a faithful servant of the Government in keeping his money and his accounts as they belonged in the subtreasury.

The cashier or teller of this bank and the managing director did this; so the report says; I do not assert it; I think it was the cashier. At any rate the report says that the acting officers of this bank took money and securities out of the bank, and went to the subtreasury and placed them in the hands of the subtreasurer of the United States, and took a receipt from him showing that these officers of the bank knew the fraud; they took a receipt from him that, after the examination on a given day, the first, second, or third after the day of the examination, he was to return them; but, in the mean time, the Government found that there was a connivance between the bank officers and the fraudulent subtreasurer, and it took this property which had been placed there to be the representative of property belonging to the Government, in fraud of the rights of the Government, and used it. How, on that statement, any Court of Claims ever could refund to the bank the money so placed there by the cashier and by the managing director of this bank to defraud the Government, if it was returned, or could open the way for such a payment, I can not see.

On what principle of equity, of justice, of law, of right, any court of the United States could decide against the right of the United States to hold this property handed over by the bank's officers in fraud of the rights of the Government for the express purpose of cheating the United States, expecting to get it back again and leave the subtreasury without assets, which it pretended to have, I can not see. But that is not my business here. It was a very proper question between the bank and the Government in my judgment, and a proper question to submit to the proper court, whether under all the circumstances the bank was not bound by the action of its cashier and its managing director, whether they had not forfeited the property by the attempt to defraud the Government on a temporary placement of it in the hands of an officer who they knew was in default and fraudulent. But by persistent effort, after years, Congress sent the case to the Court of Claims with at least the sanction of such a sending that there was some equity in it, and the Court of Claims decided that the Government should restore the value of the securities, as the Senator from Tennessee says. What was that value? What was it that the Government should restore? What does our own court say ought to be returned to this bank on a settlement and liquidation? It had no right until it had the judgment of that court, and it had no pretense of having a right until the matter was litigated before the court. On the 25th of October, 1881, and we do not know whose delay it was in not bringing the mattter sooner to a hearing, the court decided that there was due $371,025.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me one suggestion there?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bank never sued until within three days of six years after the right of action accrued.

Mr. HOAR. But there was another case which involved it.

Mr. COCKRELL. The right of action accrued on the 27th of February of one year and the suit was brought on the 24th of February of the sixth year thereafter, just three days before the six years expired.

Mr. CONGER. Yes. I thank the Senator for giving me that information.

Mr. JACKSON. The question was before the Department all that while. From the 28th of February, the day after the seizure, the bank was pressing this claim before the Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Department had no jurisdiction. I do not understand that it was pressing it. There was another suit pending, and these gentleman were lying back to see what would be the result of that other suit, and there is another bank now lying back with a claim to come in here for over $100,000. They did not get their bill into court within the six years, and they want the limitation removed. That has been up and has been reported adversely by one of the committees.

Mr. CONGER. I am very glad that I have done what I thought my duty to be in guarding the Treasury against false and improper claims, let them come from wherever they may. It has been my fortune generally to meet in the House and in the Senate what I thought were improper war claims, or claims for the loss of property during the civil war in the South, which, according to the law of nations and the rules which finally the House and Senate have adopted, were not proper subjects of compensation from the Government. This comes from the State of Massachusetts. It comes here the result of a fraudulent transaction between this bank, through its officers, and a defaulting officer of this Government in charge of the funds of the Government. If it be true, as the Senator from Missouri says, that for six long years the stockholders and managers of this bank went through all the loss caused by the failure of the bank and the destruction of their interests without even asking this Government to refund this money, that is a subject worthy of consideration by Senators in voting upon this question, and, with what I am stating here as to the dates and times and action of the Government and of the court and of these claimants, comes in very well to show why this claim of $249,000 of interest should be refused by Congress without a dissenting voice.

As I said, on the 25th of October, 1881, the Court of Claims decided that there was $371,025 which the Government ought to refund. Four days after that, October 29, 1881, without waiting for any appeal, without waiting to carry the case up to the Supreme Court, without any further litigation, somebody neglected the interests of the United States and let this judgment become final without appeal, contrary, as I think, to law. There is nothing to show but that the officers of the United States ought to and might at any time have appealed from the decision of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court, but in four days the men claiming the right to the money came to the Treasury and drew out $260,000. That was pretty swift payment of the judgment. These men were eager enough after they got the judgment to get the money, although they had let the claim lie by for six years without going into court. Then, August 30, 1882, the remaining $111,025 was paid, making the whole amount of the judgment $371,025, and then the entire face value, as is claimed here, of these securities was paid back, when in my humble judgment there was no responsibility in fact, and as I believe with my knowledge, whatever it may be, of law, if the case had been taken to the Supreme Court, as it ought to have been by those who defended the interests of the United States, no recovery could have been had. The whole amount was paid, $260,000 of it in four days after the judgment, and $111,025 on August 30, 1882, in less than a year, some ten months after the judgment was obtained.

Now, sir, I say without fear of contradiction that if there was any right at all to recover interest it was on the judgment which was obtained and on the balance which was unpaid for those ten months, which amounts to a little over $40,000 instead of $249,000.

But, sir, who are these men that come to ask this money back? What is the character of the men who come here? The bank failed, its assets were sold—the securities, the possible indebtedness of this Government—to those who were willing to give a little to speculate upon this matter.

Mr. HOAR. Why does the Senator say that?

Mr. CONGER. Because the report says that the bank failed and its assets were sold. That is why I say it. I can not go beyond the report because I have not had the opportunity. "The creditors bought it in," one Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says. He knows more about it than I do. Now, who bought in this contingent, this erratic, this nebulous, this wandering claim that slept for six years without anybody thinking it was worth bringing forward at all? Who owned it?

Mr. JACKSON. Where does the Senator find the statement in the report that these assets were sold?

Mr. CONGER. I find the report says that the bank failed.

Mr. JACKSON. And the receiver took charge of these assets and applied them to the payment of the debts, so far as they went.

Mr. CONGER. That bears me out in all I want.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. I never heard the suggestion that this claim against the Government had been sold to anybody, and I do not believe there is the slightest foundation for it.

Mr. CONGER. It appears so in the report.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand it so.

Mr. CONGER. A receiver was appointed and the assets went to pay the debts, and they were sold or turned out, each one to pay equally his debt. These were not turned out; the Government had them; so that whatever they were considered worth was sold.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. I understand that he is stating not that the general assets of this bank were sold, but that this particular claim against the Government, being assets, were sold. That I never heard of, and I do not believe it. It is not implied from anything stated in the report as I understand it, and it can not be, because the statute expressly prohibits the sale of claims against the Government. Any attempt to sell it on the part of the receiver would have been a violation of law and a nullity.

Mr. CONGER. He could sell the right of the bank. Now in whose interest is this claim brought before the Government? Is it the claim of the bank? Does the bank own it? The bank is broken down, dissolved long ago. In whose name is it? Who are to be the recipients of the $249,000 voted by the Senate to pay the Lord knows whom, and no Senator can say? We know the bank failed; we know a receiver was appointed; we know from the report that the assets went to pay the debts; we know that with a contingency like this the right to prosecute could be sold. It could be sold for one dollar, or it could be sold for one hundred dollars, or a thousand, or a hundred thousand. What would anybody have given for such a thing as that with full knowledge of the fraud and wrong of the leading officers of the bank in a contest against the United States who had secured it by the fraud of the bank and by the fraud of its own officer? There is too little known about this. Did the men who are to receive the money we vote to-day pay a dollar for the claim, or a thousand, or a hundred thousand dollars? Does it belong to the bank? Will it go to the individual stockholders of the bank, and if it does, then in case their creditors were not paid by the assignment and receivership and distribution, we give it to the stockholders of the bank in fraud of the rights of the creditors; and inasmuch as this report says the stockholders of the bank were ruined by this transaction, we may well believe that whatever right there is in this claim belongs to the creditors of the bank. If the receiver had it in any shape, and sold it, he sold it unquestionably for a song, and it is to speculators perhaps that we are granting away the money of the people of the United States—speculators who bought this claim for a song.

I am not going to dwell upon this longer than to call the attention of Senators to some facts which are plain and indisputable. I have already shown, as I think, that within the utmost limit and extent of the proprieties of paying interest on anything due from the Government it should be on a liquidated account after it is determined and acknowledged by the Government, or acknowledged in obedience to the direction of a court, and the difference is over $200,000 of money, to go, as I said before, to some one whom no Senator can mention here, some speculator who for his thousand dollars or his hundred dollars got hold of this uncertain, and as I believe improper claim against the Government has, his money having been paid to the receiver and been distributed to the creditors. Or if this is for the stockholders or for the bank by any agreement by which it may have retained it after its failure, then it belongs to the bank's creditors. Let us know who is to be the recipient of the wonderful bounty and generosity of the Senate.

Now, sir, I will not dwell longer on this case. I have performed my duty when I have said enough and shown enough both from the report and from the statement which I have made here to put every Senator on his guard against allowing this bill to pass without further information, and I shall content myself when the proper time comes with asking for the yeas and nays, that we may all have an opportunity of making our record on this bill.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to interpose to the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan my absolute and unqualified denial of the imputation that this bill places in the hands of any speculative purchaser or other person who has acquired it since this claim against the Government. The character of the gentlemen who represented this bank, which is the very highest possible, the fact that no such thing ever has been suggested to me or heard of by any member of the committee or by my colleague, makes me feel entirely warranted in stating so far as I can have knowledge of such a thing, that the suggestion is totally without foundation.

This bank went into the hands of a receiver, and its stockholders, who were I suppose like stockholders of other banks, men of capital and trustees of widows and orphans and various sorts of people, had to pay in out of their funds a sum equal to the amount of the capital stock to make good the liabilities of the bank, which, instead of being a prosperous, thriving institution, was compelled to fail by reason of this transaction, and when the bill is passed the money will go to the receiver. If there are any creditors they will be paid. If the creditors are paid and there is anything left, it will go of course to the funds of the stockholders to reimburse what they paid in.

It is true, as the Senator from Missouri suggests, that this bank waited until within three days of the end of six years before it sued the United States; but there was another test case pending, and I do not understand that public policy requires that if there are a dozen persons whose claims depend on the same state of things they shall all proceed to incur the expense of a suit at once if they bring their suits in time to save the statute of limitations, and one creditor brings his suit promptly. An appeal was taken by the Attorney-General. He examined the matter, and within the six months withdrew his appeal, because he found the case could not be distinguished in principle from another case decided by the Supreme Court. The Court of Claims had no authority to allow interest; but in a like case, the case of Francis Vigo, cited at length by the committee in their report, where Congress referred a claim to the Court of Claims with authority to give judgment according to the policy of the United States in like cases, the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal from the Court of Claims, on full examination of the statutes, declared that it is the policy of the United States to pay interest in such cases, and over fifty statutes are cited by the committee establishing that proposition.

Now, I should like to ask whether there is a Senator in this body who, if one of his domestic servants had conspired with one of mine to get some property of mine into his possession, and apparently his, would not restore that property? He would not proceed to talk about the fact that my servant was a party to the fraud. Neither of these persons was agent of the United States or of the principal for the purpose of the fraudulent transaction, and no change of property took place, nothing vested in the United States by the transaction.

That being the case, the demand was made on the United States for this property in the possession of its Treasury, and it refused to give it up. It is not the case of an unliquidated claim, which the United States is presumed always to be ready to pay. It is the case of an express refusal to pay on demand and a claim of right to the property, and thereupon the ordinary rule of law applies; and my friend from Michigan, for whose integrity I have so much respect, would put his right hand into a brazier of burning coal and have it burned to the stump before he would act in his own case, if he were dealing with me or any other person, on the principles upon which he now asks the United States to act.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee who reported the bill of what items in a general way the claim was made up, aside from the $46,000 of Government securities. How much was in cash?

Mr. JACKSON. They were the checks of the cashier for actual moneys that were collected and actual moneys deposited.

Mr. HARRISON. So that the balance of the claim besides the $46,000 was money?

Mr. JACKSON. Actual money; yes, sir. Forty-five thousand dollars or $46,000 was in Government interest-bearing securities and the balance in actual money; so that the claim was really ascertained, fixed, and determined, and was not unliquidated in its character.

Mr. HARRISON. I asked the question because as to a part of this claim it seems to me to be perfectly clear. If the Government by a method which was held by the court to be ineffectual to transfer the property of this bank secured $46,000 of its own securities that were interest-bearing and held them and in effect got the interest upon them because it did not pay the interest, I take it that in that case there can be no question in the world that in equity and good conscience, and as a matter of law between individuals, the Newton bank would be entitled to the interest received or withheld by the United States on that sum. But it seems to me as to the money the question might be quite different.

The rule as between individuals and one that is supposed to rest upon a basis of sound reason and justice is that one individual shall render interest to another for the use of money, first where he stipulates to do so, and secondly where in the judgment of the court trying the case he has unreasonably withheld money from another person. That is the rule applied in our courts to open accounts between individuals. There may be a demand, and the question is whether it has been unreasonably withheld. That is the question as between individuals. If it has been, the courts then award interest in the way of damages upon the debt.

Now, what are the facts in this case? The cashier and the managing director of this bank entered into a fraudulent arrangement with the officer of the United States in charge of its funds in the city of Boston, by which they put into his hands certain moneys. Suppose that he cashed these checks and that the proceeds are in the Treasury as actual money. When the Government comes to account with its officers he produces that as United States funds in his custody, and pro tanto settles his accounts with the Government and passes the examination by presenting them. The presence of that money there did involve the fraud and the fault of the men who were held out to the world as authorized to represent the Newton bank. If the United States had given a consideration for that money, undoubtedly the courts would have held that the acts of these two officers, though in fraud of the bank, were binding upon the bank, on the principle that where one of two innocent persons must suffer it must be the person least at fault.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the Senator allow me in that connection to call his attention to what the court has stated on that direct point?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACKSON. I read from the opinion of the court.

Mr. HARRISON. The Court of Claims?

Mr. JACKSON. The Court of Claims, as approved by the Supreme Court in the case of Newton Bank vs. United States:

> Upon the case as thus outlined, the simple question of law is whether the claimant's property in the assets was, by the fraudulent acts of its cashier and one of its directors, divested out of it and vested in the defendants. There is not the least ground for answering these points in the affirmative, unless the claimant was privy to those transactions and allowed its assets to be so used. But there is nothing in the case justifying a remote supposition that any officer, director, or stockholder of the Newton Bank, except Dyer and Carter, the conspirators, had the least knowledge or the faintest suspicion of, or the least cause to suspect, any part of the villainous scheme. It was simply a case of a bank being robbed and of its stolen assets being put into the hands of the cashier of the subtreasury for a purpose which, by no possible view, could, in law, be held to effect a transfer of the bank's right of property in them, either to him or to the United States.

> Such being the case, "it ought," in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, "to require neither argument nor authority to support the proposition, that where the money or property of an innocent person has gone into the coffers of the nation by means of a fraud to which its agent was a party, such money or property can not be held by the United States against the claim of the wronged or injured party. The agent was agent for no such purpose. His doings were vitiated by the underlying dishonesty, and could confer no rights upon his principal." (United States vs. State Bank, ut supra.)

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly. What the Senator has read is exactly in line with what I have said. The United States did not put itself in the position of an innocent party who had parted with something upon the faith of the acts of these men who were held out to have authority to represent the bank, and therefore the bank could recover the securities; but this is the situation: The United States finds in its vaults money that has been placed there, as we learn now, by the fraudulent connivance of officers of this bank with its own officers. Now, the Newton bank comes and asks that money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Indiana may finish his remarks, and then if there can be a vote that we may have it. If there can be no vote at that time and anybody else wishes to speak, I will not press the bill further now.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not asking the Senator from Illinois to give way to me. I will not do that myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business be informally laid aside in order that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the bill from which it has just passed. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to the Senator from Indiana finishing his remarks, and if then the Senate will vote upon the bill I shall waive, as far as I am concerned, the consideration of the special order until that is over; but I must insist that the Senate give attention to the interstate-commerce bill after the Senator from Indiana has finished his remarks if any body else wants to speak on the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts that the unfinished business be informally laid aside in order that the Senator from Indiana may conclude his remarks and that the bill may be finally disposed of?

Mr. CULLOM. I understand that other Senators desire to speak. If so, I shall have to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 491) for the relief of John W. Franklin, executor of the last will of John Armfield, deceased.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 754) for the relief of Nathan H. Dunphe, of Bridgewater, in the State of Massachusetts; and

A bill (H. R. 5461) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 737) to remove the political disabilities of J. R. Waddy, of Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. 4539) to issue American papers to the lighter or barge Pirate, now at New York.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. GARLAND. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the amendment before the Senate is that offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was informed that the pending question was upon the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, but he has subsequently been informed by the Secretary that it is upon the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment so that it will read:

And said commission shall precede its first report with an investigation of the subject of interstate commerce, which shall embrace the subjects of establishing a system of both maximum and minimum charges for transportation, and for the preservation of free competition within the limits so fixed, for the prohibition of discriminations of any kind whatever, either in favor of or against cities, towns, or other localities, whether the same be competing or non-competing points, and for applying the same principle to transportation for individuals, firms, associations, or corporations in all matters relating to commerce among the States; for the preservation and enforcement of the right of shippers to select the lines and parts of lines over which their shipments shall pass, to the end that said commerce among the States may avail itself of the all-rail or part rail and part water routes of the country; for the prevention of such pooling arrangements and agreements to refrain from just competition as may tend to impose unreasonable burdens upon said commerce among the States, and for the protection of said commerce against unjust exactions based on a class of securities commonly denominated "watered stock;" and said commission, in conducting said investigation, shall be guided by such rules of action as will be fair, just, and equitable toward all of the interests involved, whether the same be private, public, or corporate, connected with the subject of commerce among the States.

Mr. GARLAND. I should like to have read now by title the bill that has just come from the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARRISON. I was going to inquire whether this stands as an amendment by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought the Senator from Illinois withdrew the amendment he had offered.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Illinois withdrew his amendment to his amendment, and then I offered this as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. Substantially the only amendment which is pending is that just read, offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON]. The amendment which I had offered was the same thing with a little change.

Mr. WILSON. The difference between this and the amendment originally offered by me, and subsequently in a modified form offered by the Senator from Illinois, was made in order to meet the objection of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON], by eliminating all that part of it which requires the reporting of a bill, and simply directing the investigation to be made on the several lines provided for in the amendment.

Mr. GARLAND. Now, Mr. President, I should like to have the bill reported by title that has come from the House to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Chair now lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 5461) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers was read the first time by its title.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. GARLAND. I want to make a motion to commit the whole subject with the bill. That is the reason I had the title read, wishing to make a few remarks on that motion.

Mr. MCMILLAN. With regard to the bill now proposed to be referred to the Committee on Railroads I desire to say, representing the Committee on Commerce, that this subject is properly within the jurisdiction of that committee, but as the bill already before the Senate was introduced by the Senator from Illinois and referred to the Committee on Railroads, of which he is a member, I do not feel called upon at this time to insist upon a reference of the House bill to the Committee on Commerce, the matter having been reported from the Committee on Railroads in the shape of the bill already under consideration. For that reason I shall not insist upon any objection to the reference of the House bill to the Committee on Railroads, though the matter is properly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire simply to say that when I introduced the bill, a part of which came back as a report from the Committee on Railroads, and which was, upon my motion, referred to the Committee on Railroads, I acted at that time without really knowing that the subject had heretofore been considered by the Committee on Commerce. Its reference to the Committee on Railroads was not for the purpose of in any way slighting the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I so understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Arkansas as submitting a motion to refer the pending bill with the House bill?

Mr. GARLAND. The pending bill and all the amendments, with the House bill, to the Committee on Railroads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas desire that the House bill should be read the second time and referred, or that it remain on its first reading?

Mr. GARLAND. Remain on its first reading for the present.

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], who has charge of the Senate bill, has labored with very commendable zeal in this matter, and has urged very properly the consideration of the subject from time to time before the Senate. The other day in answer to the remarks submitted by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] he made some complaints as to the delay that would occur in regard to the bill if a postponement of it was had at this time. The proposition the Senator from Delaware then had in his mind in reference to a bill which he mentioned is now made practical by the appearance of that bill from the House, in regard to which we had seen and heard a good deal through the papers and other sources of information.

Now, I am free to state to the Senator from Illinois that he is to be congratulated on making considerably more progress in this matter than is generally made before the Senate in matters of this importance. He reported this bill in April last, and at this time he is coming well-nigh to a final hearing of it. That, I say, is making much more progress than is generally made in measures of such importance before the Senate.

The first measure that ever I introduced into the Senate about eight years ago was a simple bill to revive an appropriation to pay some postmaster in the Southern country, and I have been urging it every session during the intervening time, but it is no nearer a final conclusion now than it was then. There was but one question involved in it and a very simple question, and I fear it will take twice eight years according to that progress, if not three times eight, to get to the conclusion of it.

This measure of the Senator from Illinois involves half a dozen if not a dozen very intricate, very close, and very important questions. I do not know within my knowledge and within my reading a question which has been before the Senate in my time that is exactly as intricate as this is. In connection with the bill there are various propositions before the Senate, not merely propositions differing as to details or as to mere matters of arrangement, but propositions differing among themselves fundamentally and organically. Now for the first time we have all these propositions brought before us in one form. Every gentleman who has studied the question has had an opportunity to be heard and present by speech or by amendment his views upon it. This is a question that demands, I think above all others, that we shall go slowly indeed in solving it.

If the Senator from Illinois shall see the end of his bill at this session he will have made the most rapid progress of any gentleman who has been in the Senate, charged with any important measure, since I have been a member of it. Now, I propose to detain the Senate for a short time by going through some of the features of this bill and indicating what I think to be radical defects in it, defects that are to my mind perfectly obvious, but if Senators differ with me in that regard and have doubts as to it, the very doubts themselves should command a committal of this bill with the House bill, that the whole subject may be before the proper committee of the Senate so that they may report it back to the Senate after proper advice. I may say here, what escaped me a moment since, that the distinguished gentleman who is the father of the House bill which we received a few minutes ago has been working at it just eight years, I think, in the House; and now after these long years of toil he is congratulated upon a successful issue of the matter. So the Senator from Illinois has no just ground to complain of any particular delay, for there has been expedition plenty and I think a little too much when we come to consider the frame of the bill we are asked to indorse.

The first section of the bill speaks of the proposed commission, provides for its organization, and then the next section proceeds in this language:

SEC. 2. That the commission hereby created shall have supervision over all matters pertaining to the regulation of commerce among the several States.

The word "supervision" there is the strong word of the phrase, which carries with it the power of these commissioners. Supervision for what? Supervision to make, to change, or to alter the regulations of commerce; or is it a supervision merely to put them in a particular order and arrange them in a certain way to be presented to the community? The first of these propositions is the true one. They are to have "supervision," that is, the entire control of, not merely the overlooking of these regulations, but power to see that they are in proper shape and properly passed out, properly spelled, and properly written. They are to have full supervision of the regulations of commerce among the States.

Now, what do we understand by regulating commerce, according to the constitutional provision? It means no more nor less than the power to prescribe the rules by which commerce is governed. The word "regulation" there means the laws of commerce so far as Congress can prescribe them. This is a legislative power delegated by the Constitution to Congress, and it is one of those powers which are national in their character, and the want of which in the old Confederation was one of the reasons that necessitated the enlarging of the powers of the Union and making it in respect to this one feature a nation. But when Congress, in the exercise of a legislative power delegated to it by the Constitution, may do a thing, where do we find the power in Congress to delegate this authority delegated to it to a mere commission of seven or five or three, as the case may be? This is not like the case of heads of Departments or Secretaries, who are sometimes empowered by Congress with authority to make rules and regulations to carry into effect certain laws, for there is no law prescribed in this bill, as we shall see as we go on; and even in the laws which have heretofore delegated the power I speak of to commissioners or to Secretaries or heads of Departments, they are generally circumscribed by the power of revision in the President or some higher authority.

If the Senate get possession of the idea I am working at, it is that the Congress of the United States in this bill, in the very second section of it, is divesting itself of its legislative power as to regulating commerce among the States and putting it in the hands of a commission. It is a fundamental rule, outside of any constitutional question, that a power delegated can not be subdelegated; and it is an unheard-of thing that a legislative power can be transferred from the legislative body to any subordinate power. That has been tested repeatedly, and as many times in your State as any other in the Union [Mr. HARRISON in the chair], on propositions to submit laws to the people to be voted upon before they become operative. Senators may examine this section and see if I am correct that the commission provided in this bill has the supervision of the regulation of commerce. We get this power, so far as Congress is concerned, entirely from the Constitution, to regulate commerce among the States; that is, in other words, translated properly, to make rules to govern commerce among the States. But here we say we will not do this, but we will transfer it to a commission to make these laws, these regulations, and supervise them. That is the starting point of the bill. It takes a very large space. That is the legislative feature of the bill—delegating the regulation of commerce to the commission.

That if any transportation company engaged in interstate commerce shall collect, demand, or receive, in the transaction of the business of interstate commerce, more than a reasonable rate of compensation for the transportation of freight of any description, or for the use or transportation of any railroad-car upon its railroad, or on any of the branches thereof, or upon any railroad it has the right, license, or permission to use, operate, or control, said transportation company shall be deemed guilty of extortion.

And the matter then is to be passed upon by the commission, and the commission may make proper inquiry. We have gone from the legislature feature of this bill, and we now come to a court. We make the commission a court to try the question of extortion and to assess damages for it. The assessment of damages is essentially, in any way you consider it, a judicial proceeding. It is the application of law to a given state of facts, and that is what is called in law a judgment. Just now we had a case, the consideration of which has just passed from us, which is in the hands of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON], as to the allowance of interest upon a given sum of money that a bank has lost. Interest is damages in one sense of the word. The assessment of damages is a question of law and of facts. Here is an assessment of damages provided for in the fourth section of this bill, following section 3, and this commission, now grown from a legislative body into a judicial tribunal, is to exercise the most important judicial function in disposing of the rights of transportation companies.

Next comes section 5:

That whenever complaint is made to the commission, in such manner as it may prescribe, charging any transportation company engaged in interstate commerce with extortion or unjust discrimination in the transaction of such business, a statement of the charges thus made shall be forwarded to the transportation company, which shall be called upon to satisfy the complaint or to answer the same in writing within a reasonable given time.

Here you come to a hearing upon the case made before this court, before these commissioners. Then they are to proceed to assess the damages under section 6 of this bill. There is no avoiding the conclusion, Mr. President, that this erects a court in the country to try these most important questions, these most complicated questions, these questions in which every State in this Union and every Territory also has an interest. There are no more important questions and no more vexing questions, as I shall show after awhile, that have ever been before the courts of this country, from the Supreme Court to the lowest in the land, than the very questions this commission are empowered to try here. And they are to try these questions in somewhat of a summary proceeding, without jury, without appeal. Their assessment of damages is to stand; there is no appeal from it.

Why is not a body with such functions called a court? The name is nothing. It is clothed with all the essential features as well as all the paraphernalia of a court. You have to make your complaint; the party is to answer, and then he is to proceed to trial. That is a court; you may call it by any name you please. The power under the Constitution to make courts in this country is of course very large; it is almost unlimited to make courts for national purposes; but when you come, following this line of argument, to see in section 9 the winding up of the court feature of this bill there is something deserving the particular attention of the Senate:

SEC. 9. That in making any investigation required by this act the commission shall have power to summon and require the attendance of witnesses, to administer oaths, and to require the production of all books, papers, contracts, and documents, or properly certified abstracts thereof, relating to the matter under investigation and necessary for the information of the commission in connection therewith.

How has it been in the acts heretofore passed? Take the practice act, section 881 of the Revised Statutes, where provision is made for compelling the attendance of witnesses; no such power is given to a commissioner of the United States as is given here, or to any other officer, except a judge of the United States, who holds his position for life. That provision in the practice act requires the commissioner to certify the fact of the remaining away of a witness to the judges of the court, and they make the order issuing an attachment for him if necessary. Take the seventy-eighth rule of equity practice established by the Supreme Court of the United States. In the taking of depositions, where a witness is in contempt and fails to attend according to the subpœna, that fact must be certified to the judge of the court before he is compelled to attend. Take the institutions of inquiries in reference to revenue matters that are committed to subordinate officers over the country. Where they have power to administer oaths and examine witnesses, the power is expressly withheld from them to compel the production of books and papers and compel the attendance of witnesses by process such as is contemplated by this bill. It is true that in some of these statutes if the witness does not attend it is said he shall be liable to a penalty; but that is not the case here. The bill gives this commission the compulsory power at once to compel the production of books and papers and the attendance of parties, and subjects the companies to this investigation and witnesses to this compulsory process before this commission that is only to exist for a limited time.

Never before in the case of these mere outside commissions has the power to compel the attendance of witnesses been given. Congress sometimes seeks to compel such attendance through its own committees; but the Supreme Court in the recent Kilbourn case sheared this power down very materially.

Sir, this is a step which I do not think we are warranted under the Constitution in taking, and there has never been before anything of the sort attempted in this country, even in providing rules and regulations for the government of the Territories, over which it is conceded, as a general proposition, that Congress has unlimited legislative power. I ask Senators to pause and consider these propositions before they incorporate into our system this court to sit over these important matters with this unlimited jurisdiction, with no power of review, with the authority to compel a witness by attachment or other process to attend and subject himself to examination, as well as to require the production of the books and papers of the companies.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me a moment?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. I was not in when the Senator began his remarks. Has he considered the effect of section 9, which goes far beyond the books and papers?

Mr. GARLAND. I am on that now.

Mr. BAYARD. That compels any man's papers, whether he belongs to a transportation company or not, to be brought into court and subjected to examination.

Mr. GARLAND. Precisely. That is the part of the section I was considering. As the Senator from Delaware has suggested, it not only takes the party himself, but it gives the commission power to throw its lasso in every direction and to roam all over the country and bring in every person, every other man, so to speak, into this investigation. This is a power which I contend, under the Constitution, we can not put in the hands of this commission. We can not do it, though we have unlimited control over interstate commerce under the Constitution. When we understand what interstate commerce is, when we have prescribed what it is, yet we can not do this. There are other provisions of the Constitution which stand as high as that and are of as much importance, and as much sacredness, and as much dignity, that forbid the clothing of this commission with the power that is here proposed to be given.

Are not the courts of the country as at present organized competent to deal with these questions? It seems to me they are; but if they are not, and if it is proper, enlarge their jurisdiction as to this subject; but do not set up in the country an independent tribunal, with these vast powers, with no restraint upon them except their "discretion," as it is frequently mentioned in the bill.

To meet the case before us, what should be done? If I read this power of the Constitution aright, Congress should prescribe its regulations itself. It should not say if a company, in the judgment of the commission, charges extraordinary rates or practices extortion the commission shall prescribe regulations. That should not be left to any commission or person in the world to determine; but Congress should prescribe the rule itself, and that is what the Constitution means; that is one of the regulations contemplated by the Constitution.

One of the amendments pending to the bill, if I recollect aright—I do not know which it is in the multitude of them—goes so far as to provide that the commission shall prepare and report a code, an interstate-commerce code, you may call it. Now, where do we get the authority to delegate that power to the commission to make us a code of laws on the subject of interstate commerce? Congress itself may make a code, and Congress ought to make it, and after the code is made a commission might be organized by Congress, if it was necessary, to properly enforce and carry out the rules and regulations of the code. Our Revised Statutes were made by a committee of revision, but nobody ever contended that the action of that committee of revision was law until Congress adopted it.

We might organize a commission to investigate and report to us what, in their judgment, it was deemed best to do, and if we saw proper to adopt what it proposed and put it in the form of an enactment then it would be law, but nothing short of that could make it law. We had once in Arkansas a very interesting question of this character, running parallel with it. The constitution provided for a commission every few years to revise and digest the laws. The commissioners revised and digested them, and while they were at it they made twenty-five or thirty more laws. The first time the supreme court got hold of it they said, "This is no law at all, this extra work. You were authorized to revise and digest the statutes, but in addition to that you have gone to work and made laws. These we will expunge; we will blot these out of your report; and having done that, we will look at your digest of the laws that are existing and see what we will do with that." So the power that is here attempted to be conferred upon a commission simply provides that commission shall do what the Constitution says Congress has the power to do and which Congress can not delegate, that is, the power to make an interstate-commerce code. A commission to look into this immense business, collect information, and report facts and figures to Congress for legislation under its power to regulate commerce, is one thing and a very legitimate thing; but it is very essentially different from the power here given.

The bill proceeds in section 13 to determine what is meant by a transportation company engaged in interstate commerce. There the committee reporting the bill have struck the most dangerous precedent in the Government. There the committee in reporting the bill have struck, I say, the most important and the most intricate question that there is in the Government. The line of demarkation there is more difficult to run than anywhere else between the powers of the General Government and those of the States respectively; and we undertake to say here what that line is as a guide for the commission. I venture the assertion that Congress can not define what that is. Why? You can never define it except in the given case. You may take every case that has been reported in the Supreme Court of the United States, from Ogden vs. Gibbons down to the present day, and you will find no question upon which the judges differ so much as the one question, what is State commerce properly speaking, and what is interstate commerce as distinguished from it.

I have before me, in the twenty-first volume of Wallace's reports, the Maryland tax case, where Judge Bradley delivered the opinion of the court, in which there was a dissenting opinion upon this very question as to what was interstate commerce and what was State commerce properly speaking. Judge Bradley in language almost deplored the difficulty that the court had encountered in applying this doctrine and making this distinction. He finally decided, however, that it was a question entirely for the State, in which respect Judge Miller and others differed from him. Then Judge Bradley makes a dissertation upon the very difficulty upon which I am now dwelling, the fixing of landmarks, the proper plane to be seen and to be observed in regard to this distinction.

Here you undertake to do it in this bill. It is a question for the courts to pass upon, and no higher, no more difficult question comes before the courts than this. If I read the spirit of our institutions correctly, in a clash between the States and the Government of the United States the greatest danger under the Constitution arises upon this very question. The Senator from Illinois need not be in too big a hurry to encounter the question in all its length and breadth and call for a speedy settlement of it. He has made proper and legitimate and commendable expedition in this matter.

In making these objections to the bill of the Senator from Illinois I should in good faith attempt to give him, as we say in the courts, a "better writ." I do not like his, and now I will try to give him a better one in general. Looking over the amendments that have been offered here, there are some ten or twelve of them, the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], according to my judgment, as well as the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER], looks in the proper direction; and from the cursory examination that I have been able to give the House bill that is now somewhat before the Senate for consideration, I am disposed to think that that is the best bill of all, because it undertakes to define exactly what we want done, and does not leave it for subordinate officers or agents to do the work.

It keeps to that extent within the Constitution. It does not attempt to delegate our legislative power to some one else. It does not attempt to delegate the power of making a code or making a law for interstate commerce to any one else; but we, the Congress, make it or attempt to make it in that bill. It leaves the question to the courts as the courts now are organized to enforce the law, and does not erect a court without any responsibility, a court without any appeal, a court without any review or any restraint to revise it. It leaves the courts to settle it as they are now organized, with the right of appeal according to the Constitution and the laws of the country. I think that is the better bill between the two, and I think, upon the cursory examination I have been able to give it, it is the best bill that has been offered upon the subject.

While I say the House bill appears to be more in the direction of what I think is needed, yet I do not commit myself to it, as I have not had an opportunity to examine it closely, and as this whole matter is one of peculiar difficulty to deal with.

With these general remarks, I ask the Senator from Illinois in good faith, because I want to accomplish what I think he is seeking, to let this matter go back to the committee, the House bill and all, with the benefit of the discussion that we have had upon it and the suggestions thrown out by the different amendments, and there let them prepare a bill that they in their judgment think will meet the exigency of the time. The House bill would necessarily go to the committee; but if the consideration of the Senate bill is still held up, unless I find some objectionable features in the House bill I shall offer it in the end, if the consideration of the Senate bill is pressed, as a substitute for the entire business. But let the House bill be printed and referred to the committee, let the whole subject be committed to the committee, and with the importance of this question, with the demand for making some changes in this great and important question, with the demand for legislation upon the subject, I, for one, will co-operate most heartily with the Senator from Illinois in getting final action at this session.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] suggests that there is no necessity for this matter to lose its hold upon the Senate, and I believe I speak for all Senators around me when I say that they will cheerfully aid in bringing the measure to a final close at this session. I can not give my sanction to this bill, or anything like it, for the reasons I have stated. I hope the whole matter will be committed to the committee, and let them, with all these details and amendments before them, frame a measure that they think will meet the exigency.

I submit the motion to refer the House bill, with the pending Senate bill and all the amendments, to the Committee on Railroads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chair will state to the Senator from Arkansas that a motion to refer the House bill until its second reading is not in order. If there be no objection, the House bill will be read by its title, when it will be considered as read the second time. Then a motion to refer will be in order.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (H. R. 5461) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection this will be considered the second reading of the House bill. The Chairs hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not intend to take the time of the Senate more than a moment. I am certainly obliged to the honorable Senator from Arkansas for the compliment of having manifested some zeal in the effort that I have made in trying to get a bill on this subject passed by the Senate; but I was forced almost to believe that his remark that there had been very rapid progress made by the Senate upon the question was really meant as a joke. I have not been able to see that the Senate has made much progress. I have been almost induced to believe that the policy of the Senate was to get bills in here upon the Calendar from some committee and there let them sleep and die. I have supposed that the purpose of the Congress of the United States was to pass bills upon important questions; and while I am not disposed to press a bill beyond what seems to be propriety in the case or more rapidly than is consistent with due consideration, it does seem to me that if we are going to pass a bill upon this important question our duty is to consider it in the Senate, and to consider it as constantly as may be consistent with the other work of the Senate until we reach a vote and put it upon its passage.

While it may be proper to refer the bill to the committee before we take a final vote upon it, my desire has been to keep the bill before the Senate for consideration and discussion and amendment until we could learn what the views of Senators were upon it; so that if it finally was referred to the committee the committee would have some idea of the views of the Senate to guide them in the consideration of it in the committee. As it stands to-day we have merely, and but merely, entered upon the consideration of it by way of amendments. We have just come to that period of time. While I should be glad, indeed, to accommodate myself to the views of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas—because I regard him as one of the most eminent lawyers in this body or in the country—I would prefer that the bill should remain before the Senate for consideration and discussion and amendment until we can arrive at some understanding of what the views of the Senate may be upon these important and controverted points.

I have no personal ambition to have the bill that I have had the honor to bring to the Senate passed if it is not the best one. On the contrary, I am exceedingly anxious that this whole subject shall be discussed, shall be considered deliberately, and then that the very best bill in the interest of the public shall be passed by the Congress of the United States at the end. What I want to do is to get some bill passed. This subject, as was said a few days ago, has been considered now for ten years, mainly in the House of Representatives, but somewhat in the Senate of the United States. The people of this country have come to believe that it is a mere football for the Congress of the United States to kick at whenever they have an opportunity and nothing else to do. What I want to do is to convince the people that we are trying to do something in their interest, and that we are able to do it, and that we shall be able to pass some bill, so that if there is any need of giving them relief they shall have it.

I shall not stop at this moment to discuss the various constitutional questions that the honorable Senator has suggested, but I should like that both bills, if you please, shall remain where they are, and that we shall go forward in the discussion and amendment of the bill now before the Senate under consideration until we arrive at something near what we understand to be the best bill that can be passed. Then, if the bill seems to be in such condition that it would require a reference to the committee to be looked at more carefully, to consider the effect of one amendment upon another, so far as I am concerned if an understanding can be had by which we shall get the bill back again and finally reach a vote and pass it so that the two Houses can come together in favor of this important measure, I would not stand in the way. But for the present I must resist the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to refer the whole subject to the Committee on Railroads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate recommit the bill?

Mr. BAYARD. Has the House bill been referred?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The House bill has been read a second time and is now on the Secretary's table not referred.

Mr. BAYARD. Under the rule, ought it not to be referred to the appropriate committee now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to refer it to the appropriate committee is in order. The Senator from Arkansas, however, has given a notice in regard to its disposition.

Mr. GARLAND. I asked that the House bill might lie on the table for the present, because if the motion to recommit the Senate bill is carried, then I desire the House bill to go too; but if the Senate bill is not recommitted, I wish to move the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the House bill, or I shall offer the House bill as a substitute for the whole matter. That is the position it is in.

Mr. BAYARD. The House bill is not yet printed. I do not know, nor do perhaps the members of the House know, precisely what bill they have passed. Certainly no member of the Senate does. It is in manuscript yet. It was variously amended in the House in the course of debate.

The proposition of the Senator from Arkansas is that the Senate bill shall be recommitted, and at the same time the House bill goes in the ordinary course of business to the same committee.

I submit to my friend from Illinois that it would rather facilitate the object he has in view to allow both bills (that is to say, the propositions heretofore made by the Senate, which we have now under consideration, and the result of the discussions in the House which has now come to us) to go to the committee of which he is a member, and from which we may therefore expect a very early report upon the subject.

My friend from Illinois is a practical man, eminently so, and his desire in this case is to have some practical result of the discussions in the Senate and the House. I submit to him that while it is perfectly proper and eminently wise that there shall be full discussion upon a subject of this kind, and that discussion must precede the vote of the Senate upon it, yet in order to discuss wisely there must be some definite proposition before the Senate. The Senate may not agree with the views of the House, but may take, as they have heretofore taken, a measure which I do not understand to be in accord with the suggestions of the House. I do not know fully what the measure of the House is, but I have the impression that it differs, and differs most importantly, differs upon principle as well as upon detail, from the measures and the propositions of the Senate. It is our first duty to come, if we can, into accord with the propositions of the House; and if we do so the propositions of the bill will take the form of law.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me, I desire to say that I do not disagree with the honorable Senator. The situation of the subject is this: The Senate is now considering the Senate bill. Under the rules of the Senate, I understand it is the right of the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the Senate bill, the bill before the Senate, and perfect the text of that bill before any substitute can be offered. As a matter of fact the honorable Senator from Oregon has already offered substantially the House bill; it may be somewhat different in some particulars; but before the consideration and amendment of the Senate bill proper can be concluded the House bill which but a few moments ago came into the Senate will have been printed, and there will be an opportunity to offer it as a substitute for the Senate bill under consideration, after the Senate bill may have been discussed and considered and amended as the Senate sees proper to amend it.

So the purpose that the Senator from Delaware is seeking to accomplish and the purpose that I desire to accomplish are substantially the same; and I think if we go forward with the consideration of the Senate bill now and amend it as the Senate sees proper, the House bill will be in such a condition that Senators can see it and it may be offered as a substitute for the Senate bill, or the whole subject may be referred to the committee if it is the wish of the Senate to do so.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I desire to ask the honorable Senator before he sits down whether under the definition given in the bill of transportation companies it is intended to include vessels engaged in the coasting trade.

Mr. CULLOM. Between the States?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes; the coasting trade between the States. I ask if that is a subject of legitimate jurisdiction for the Committee on Railroads and whether the Committee on Commerce might not more properly consider it?

Mr. CULLOM. That question was discussed only a few moments ago. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce has stated the reason why he did not seek to have the bill referred to that committee.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The question of regulating the coasting trade is rather a complicated one and is entirely different from the railroad system.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] to recommit the bill, with all pending amendments and amendments that have been received and printed.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I do not suppose that I contribute anything to the general stock of information on this subject when I say that if we are to have any bill regulating interstate commerce by this Congress it must be by action upon the bill just sent over from the House of Representatives. We may either adopt that with amendments, or we may strike out all of it except the title and insert whatever the Senate pleases by way of amendment; but in any event we shall make no step of substantial progress by continuing further the consideration of the Senate bill. It is true that something might be accomplished by debate in reaching a concert of minds with regard to the subject-matter of the bill; but in a parliamentary sense, the bill of the House having reached us, there is no further step in advance that can be taken except by consideration of the House bill.

I have no desire to antagonize the wishes of the Senator from Illinois who has this measure in charge; I shall consider myself as a volunteer to follow his direction; but it appears to me, looking at it as a proposition of parliamentary procedure, and also from the standpoint of one sincerely desirous of having something done by the present Congress, that the wiser course would be to have the bill of the House referred promptly to the Committee on Railroads, if that is the committee from which the measure proceeds. Let it be accompanied also by the bill of the Senate with all of the amendments that have been made and offered thereto. Then let a meeting of the committee be called immediately to consider these propositions, to-morrow morning if need be. I assume that the importance of this subject would justify such action. If a majority of the committee see fit to report back the House bill with every word stricken out except the title and propose as an amendment the bill that has already been presented to us by the committee of the Senate, well and good; we have been advanced one step in parliamentary progress; we are so much nearer our goal if we are to reach it at all. I should hope that the Senator from Illinois would see his way clear to this conclusion, but if he does not of course I shall follow him.

I wish to say one word more before I sit down. I have understood that the Senator from Illinois apprehended that there might be some loss of position by reason of the fact that the bill having been assigned as a special order and then recommitted it could not be again made a special order without the assent of two-thirds of the Senate. My understanding of the rules is that if the House bill should be reported to-morrow morning from the Committee on Railroads, with whatever amendments they see fit to add thereto, immediately, without debate, upon a vote of a majority of the Senate to that end, the bill can be taken up for discussion, and having been taken up, the discussion can continue without limitation so long as the Senate pleases.

Mr. CULLOM. As against special orders?

Mr. INGALLS. As against all special orders.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to repeat that my purpose is simply that the Senate shall consider the Senate bill sufficiently to draw from Senators whatever suggestions they may have in reference to it in the way of amendment. I know that one or two Senators at least have prepared amendments to the bill which the Senate is now considering, which amendments I would be glad to have offered so as to know exactly what they are, because they may be of that class of amendments which will be somewhat in harmony with the general idea of the bill under consideration and may be incorporated in the bill without very much discussion or delay. If the bill is to be recommitted I should like to have the benefit of those amendments before the Senate before the reference shall be made. Besides, I should like to know, as the honorable Senator from Kansas has suggested, when the bill is recommitted and the Committee on Railroads consider it and report it back, that we shall not be crowded out so that in the end there would be nothing further heard from the subject during this session of Congress. My purpose is, as I said awhile ago, that Congress shall not only consider the question as it has been periodically doing for the last ten or twelve years, but that something shall be accomplished in the interest of the people of this country in the way of legislation.

Mr. GARLAND. The amendments referred to by the Senator from Illinois can all be offered and sent to the committee along with what is now before the Senate. Now that we have reached a place to solve this matter for the time being, under the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas, let these amendments be sent in with the others, and let the whole subject be referred to the Committee on Railroads, and for one (I can only promise for myself) I shall do all I can to aid the Senator from Illinois in getting this matter up at any time and having a final conclusion upon it.

Mr. HARRISON. I think with the Senator from Illinois who is in charge of the bill that if we had employed the time that has been used this afternoon in discussing the methods by which to arrive at this matter upon the bill itself we should have made substantial progress.

Now, the measure is likely to come out of the committee in one of two ways, if it goes there under the motion of the Senator from Arkansas. I should say it would probably come back from the committee with the recommendation that the bill which our committee has already reported, modified perhaps by reason of suggestions which have been made since the discussion began, should be adopted as a substitute for the House bill.

Mr. INGALLS. As an amendment to the House bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, as an amendment, but practically in common parlance a substitute, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting. I do not profess to be possessed of prophetic power, but if the Senate bill with pending amendments and the House bill should be referred to the Committee on Railroads I think we should find that that would be the result. If that is to be the result, is it not better, while the subject is before the Senate, instead of having the matter discussed in the committee, that the Senate itself should discuss it, letting the House bill go to the committee? Thus we should get the judgment of the Senate upon the pending amendments, one of which, as has been said, is substantially the House bill, at least the original Reagan bill, and when we have reached a conclusion upon the amendments in the Senate, if the Committee on Railroads will then take the bill as the Senate has perfected it, if it shall please them, and report it as a substitute for the House bill, we should be ready to vote in all probability and bring it to a speedy issue.

The only interest I have is that having this subject before us I think the wisest policy of those who would like to see legislation would be to adhere to the discussion of it and to go on with the decision of the pending questions upon the amendments until we have obtained an expression of the Senate upon the whole subject. Of course final action should be upon the House bill, but I believe we should be nearer an end of this matter if the Senate perfects the bill and if the committee are advised in advance, as they would be instructed by votes of the Senate upon each one of these particular propositions, and then present a bill as an amendment to the House bill which will meet concurrence without much discussion.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The popular opinion is that this measure relates only to transportation by railroads. Whatever abuses or extortions have given rise to this and kindred measures I think have originated in that description of transportation. I have no hesitation in saying that the provisions of this bill, if the subject may require special attention, applies to the whole commercial marine of the United States engaged in the coasting trade. We have been legislating for a year or two with a purpose of building up our miserable commerce, as it has been called—our poor commerce, on the seas, not on the land, because I believe it was said that the railroad corporations have been well able to take care of themselves. But when it came to our struggling mariners and our little shipping interests along the coast, the Senator from Maine not now in his seat [Mr. FRYE] I remember session after session has been struggling to get laws repealed and laws enacted to encourage and build up that. I am sure on reflection that so far as that species of trade and commerce is concerned there is no special necessity for appointing a commission to prescribe the rates of freight that go to the poor ship-owners on our coast or that consideration ought especially to be given by the Committee on Railroads to that subject.

Mr. DAWES. I can not quite understand the reluctance to discussing this question, but I must admire the different devices which are resorted to for its postponement. If we desire to come to a conclusion upon this matter, the way is so plain, and the only existing way, that the effort to keep out of it is admirable to me. We have here the House bill and we have the Senate bill. If we are to accomplish anything, what we determine in the Senate will ultimately be put as a substitute or amendment for the House bill. The ordinary rules take the House bill to a committee. The Senate bill is under discussion. What we propose to substitute for the House bill must be the result of long discussion here. We have had part of that discussion; we are approaching a decision; we are coming to a conclusion as to what is the desire of a majority of the Senate; and the moment that appears evident every device seems to be resorted to in order to give it the go-by.

If we desire that the result of the discussions of the two Houses shall be a law, the plain way is for us to go on with the discussion of our own measure until we determine what is the will of a majority of this body. We bring it into shape and form, and when we have brought it into shape and form we have the thing which we are to offer as an amendment to the House bill; our discussion has closed; our minds are brought together; that which we shall determine is the best possible form of legislation will have been effected, and we shall have accomplished something.

But if there is any particular reason why this measure shall have the go-by for this session and not seem to be killed, if there is any good reason why we shall appear to be anxious to have some interstate commerce law and yet not have such a law, the means resorted to and the suggestions which I have heard within two or three days in respect to the best method to consider this bill are admirably calculated to bring about just such a result. We shall seem to the country to be exceedingly anxious to have some measure of relief, some law, and yet we shall go on with entire safety and with confidence that no such law will be the result of our deliberations.

As was said by the Senator from Illinois, such has been the course for ten years. The people of this country have understood that the Congress of the United States has been deliberating, has been devising some measure of relief as to interstate commerce; yet the Congress of the United States has rested in perfect confidence that however much it may debate the measure, sometimes at one end of the Capitol and sometimes at the other end of the Capitol, nobody may take alarm, nothing will come of it in the shape of a law.

But now the Senate of the United States has it in its power to enact a law. It has got in its possession the will of the other branch. All it has to do is to determine what is its own will, and it has a bill before it for that purpose. It has been for weeks trying to ascertain what its own will is. As it approaches the point where its will shall be determined, I hear from different parts of the Senate suggestions that after all we had better rest awhile; we had better take this deliberately; we had better not act rashly. A bill has come over here from the House and it is to go to a committee. Let us quietly subside and let that bill take its ordinary course in committee. It will come back here, and then after this interim we shall go on with our debate as to what measure we shall offer, if any, as a substitute for it, or some one will suggest that it had better go over until the next Congress.

Sir, if the Senate desires legislation it has it in its power to effect that result now, and the plain, honest, straightforward way is to consider the measure now before it. I hope the Senator from Illinois will resist any motion to take his bill out of the hands of the Senate and send it back to the committee to sleep there alongside of the House bill, which so long as it is there is safe.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to inquire whether the motion to refer was not withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to recommit is pending, with notice that, if that motion shall be agreed to, the motion then will be made to refer the House bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the motion to recommit will be voted down.

Mr. CONGER. If these bills are to be referred to committees and to await the action there, both the Senate bill and the House bill, it seems to me the House bill should take its proper and legitimate direction and be committed to the Committee on Commerce, which has always had the consideration of intercommercial affairs. In conversation with some members of that committee it was thought that as the House bill had come over here it would be better that that bill should be referred, a little out of its order, to the Committee on Railroads, in order to facilitate the examination of the House bill and permit the Committee on Railroads in that examination to determine what disposition they shall make of the pending bill.

Without committing myself to either of these bills, or to all the provisions of them, I am free to say that I think the country expects some legislation upon this subject during this session that will in some manner relieve the country from the complaints which are continually made in regard to the subject of interstate commerce. I have thought, and so the chairman of the Committee on Commerce has thought, although I was not present when he made his remarks, that it would be better to forego the control of the House bill to the proper committee, the Committee on Commerce, and let it go to the Committee on Railroads, who have had so much charge of this whole question, and let the discussion in the Senate go on, and, as has been very properly said by the Senator from Massachusetts, let the Senate by its discussions and by its amendments at least come to some conclusion in regard not only to the Senate bill but as to what should be done with the House bill, for every Senator has the opportunity of seeing at a glance, even while the discussion is going on, what the House bill contains, although it may have been referred to a committee.

I assent to the proposition that the bill shall be referred to the Committee on Railroads instead of going to the Committee on Commerce, where it would probably belong, and where from some of its provisions in regard to water navigation it ought by all means to go, except that we can meet those questions perhaps here in the Senate as well as before the committee. Let this discussion go on and let the Senate proceed with the consideration of the Senate bill, and let the House bill be referred to the Committee on Railroads and be as soon as possible reported back in accordance with the will of the Senate with such amendments or such substitution as they shall think the votes of the Senate and the will of the Senate shall demand.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the motion to recommit will be voted down, but I wish to suggest to the honorable Senator from Michigan that if it is the wish or view of the Senate that water-routes or transportation by water should not be included in the bill a very few amendments to section 12 would take all that out of the bill, if in the judgment of the Senate it ought not to be there.

Mr. CONGER. It was in view of the opportunity of making such amendments here that, after consultation at least with some of the members of the Committee on Commerce and what we thought would be the natural proprieties of amendments to the bill, we did not ask that even that part of the Senate bill should be sent to the Committee on Commerce—at least as individuals we did not—but that whatever amendments we might see proper to propose as individuals or as members of the committee for the interest of the water navigation of the country should be made in the Senate.

Mr. SLATER. It is quite apparent that there is no real difference on the two sides of the Chamber in regard to the result to be reached, parliamentarily speaking, on the bill. I shall vote to recommit the bill now under consideration, and should the Senate decide not to recommit it I shall then vote against the reference of the House bill, as I desire to have the two bills considered in conjunction. I think the proper method is by unanimous consent to let the House bill be printed, and let the Senate bill be considered as pending as a substitute to it. That will reach the point precisely, as I understand it, that both sides of the Chamber desire.

Mr. MAXEY. The object which I have in view is by some means to have the House bill considered along with the Senate bill. This bill now has hold of the Senate. The subject-matter of the House bill being the same as that of the bill before the Senate, the course which would be best would be to have the House bill considered along with the Senate bill, so that we may have the whole question before us. That is what I want to do, and if that can be accomplished better by retaining the Senate bill before the Senate, let the House bill be considered along with it without a reference, and then we shall have the whole matter before us.

Mr. CULLOM. I am informed that the House bill, which has been passed by that body and is now on the table of the Senate, will be printed by to-morrow morning, so that every Senator may have a copy of it. So far as I am concerned I desire that the House bill shall lie on the table and that we may go forward with the consideration of the bill before the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. I said what I did with the expectation that the House bill would be printed by to-morrow, and with the further expectation that it was impossibe to close the consideration of the Senate bill this evening, so that we should have the benefit of the House bill to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Chair if the House bill will be printed unless there is an order to that effect?

Mr. MAXEY. I ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule when a House bill is referred it is printed. If it is not referred the Senate must order the printing.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that it may be printed. Let that be understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to move at this time that the House bill be printed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order to print is made. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] to recommit the Senate bill.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 18, noes 24.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. GARLAND. I want to make a motion that we proceed to the consideration of the House bill, but the House bill has been ordered to be printed. I wish the Senator from Illinois, if he can see his way through, to consent to the proposition I submit. If we pass a bill of our own here and send it to the House it goes there as a Senate bill and may not be reached this session. If we take up the House bill and pass that, that ends it; or if we amend that bill and send it back to the House with amendment, we shall get a result sooner. Will not the Senator from Illinois consent to let this bill go over until to-morrow and then have us proceed to the consideration of the House bill and accomplish what he wants?

Mr. CULLOM. I should like exceedingly to accommodate the honorable Senator from Arkansas, but my purpose is to go forward with the discussion and consideration of the Senate bill until we get it as nearly perfected as possible, by which time I have no doubt the House bill will be printed and on our tables, and then, if the bill remains in the Senate, I propose to offer as a substitute, or rather as an amendmendment to the House bill, the bill of the Senate as perfected.

Mr. GARLAND. That is perfectly feasible, and then it will go back, if amended in that way, to the House with the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly

Mr. GARLAND. And they will get on there much quicker than if we send them the Senate bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no expectation of pressing the Senate bill to a passage by the Senate. What I desire is to offer it, when it is perfected by the Senate, as an amendment to the House bill, so that the two bodies may come together.

Mr. GARLAND. With that understanding, that to-morrow we shall get to the consideration of the House bill, my purpose is reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois as amended.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as amended will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And said commission shall precede its first report with an investigation of the subject of interstate commerce, which shall embrace the subjects of establishing a system of both maximum and minimum charges for transportation, and for the preservation of free competition within the limits so fixed, for the prohibition of discriminations of any kind whatever, either in favor of or against cities, towns, or other localities, whether the same be competing or non-competing points, and for applying the same principle to transportation for individuals, firms, associations, or corporations in all matters relating to commerce among the States; for the preservation and enforcement of the right of shippers to select the lines and parts of lines over which their shipments shall pass, to the end that said commerce among the States may avail itself of the all-rail or part rail and part water routes of the country; for the prevention of such pooling arrangements and agreements to refrain from just competition as may tend to impose unreasonable burdens upon said commerce among the States, and for the protection of said commerce against unjust exactions based on a class of securities commonly denominated "watered stock;" and said commission, in conducting said investigation, shall be guided by such rules of action as will be fair, just, and equitable toward all of the interests involved, whether the same be private, public, or corporate, connected with the subject of commerce among the States.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. There is, I believe, now no amendment pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no amendment except the one in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe it was agreed that that should be withheld until the text of the bill as reported by the committee was perfected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute is suspended. Any amendment to either the original text or to the substitute will take precedence.

Mr. HARRISON. So I supposed. I rose for the purpose of moving to strike out in the first section the words after the word "President," in line 19, to and including the word "representation," in line 22.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 19 of section 1, after the word "President," it is proposed to strike out:

And the commissioners shall be appointed so that the different interests affected by this act shall have, as nearly as possible, proper representation.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] has an amendment pending to strike out the whole of this section after the word "Senate," in line 8, and it is proper, I suppose, that the vote should be taken on this, which proposes to strike out a smaller part.

I desire simply to say that it seems to me this commission should not be composed of men who are supposed to represent interests. The words which I move to strike out would imply that there was to be a railroad man on the commission, perhaps a railroad president or officer, and that there was to be some one representing the agriculturists, some one representing the manufacturing interests, and so on. If this commission is to accomplish the good which is expected of it it should not be made up of men who represent particular interests. We should not have there some one who understands that he is there as the representative of the railroad companies, and some one else that he is there as the representative of the interests of shippers who desire lower rates. We shall have no wise consideration of this question and no useful recommendations, in my judgment, from such a commission. I believe the President should be left free to choose men who will represent the general interests of the whole country, rather than to choose men who will stand for special interests. Therefore I move to strike out these words.

Mr. CULLOM. I was interrupted at the time when the amendment was read, and I ask that it be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not care to take up the time of the Senate further than to say a word. So far as I am concerned I am not very particular whether that language remains in the bill or not. The Senate has had the opportunity of seeing the various enactments of different States upon this subject of transportation, and they will find that in most of them there is a reference to the different business interests of the country being represented upon the board. I think myself with the Senator from Indiana that there is probably nothing to be gained by that sort of a clause in this bill, if the appointing power exercises that discretion and prudence and wisdom which he ought to do, and which I suppose would be done in the case of the President of the United States.

I do not care to take up the time of the Senate in discussing the provisions, and hope the vote will be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Indiana that while the original appointments are made by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, in the case of vacancies occurring by removal, resignation, or other cause there is no provision here that the Senate must agree to the Presidential appointments. Does the Senator from Indiana consider that that is implied in the section?

Mr. HARRISON. I am not responsible for that phraseology, but I should think that it would be implied.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The original appointment, I see, must be by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and in case of vacancy from any cause the provision is that the President shall fill it.

Mr. HARRISON. As this would be a public office, I suppose that without any such provision in the law the appointment could only be with the advice and consent of the Senate; but if the Senator has any doubt he can move to insert those words.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am not particular about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

A division was called for.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as I am concerned, I will withdraw any opposition to the amendment.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 9; no quorum voting.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask that the amendment may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. BLAIR. The words there are "proper representation." I suppose that they are used simply in the sense of intelligent representation. It can not be possible that the provisions of the bill are for the creation of a commission that is to be made up of men interested specially for the railroads that are to be supervised; and yet the bill ought to provide, it seems to me, that this commission be made up of those who are intelligent upon the subject, and it would be very difficult to find men competent to supervise the transportation of the country who have not had more or less connection with and experience in the management of railroads.

I do not believe, since this language is taken from the acts of the various States, as the Senator in charge of the bill has stated, that there can be any possible objection to the present language. The word "proper" can simply mean intelligent, competent representation.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	George,	Miller of Cal.,	Sewell,
Beck,	Hampton,	Mitchell,	Sheffield,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to insert at the end of section 3 these words:

Which is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That if any transportation company engaged in interstate commerce shall collect, demand, or receive, in the transaction of the business of interstate commerce, more than a reasonable rate of compensation for the transportation of freight of any description, or for the use or transportation of any railroad-car upon its railroad, or on any of the branches thereof, or upon any railroad it has the right, license, or permission to use, operate, or control, said transportation company shall be deemed guilty of extortion, which is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor.

This bill is framed to punish what is here defined and is described as extortion by a criminal prosecution, but it is not anywhere declared in the bill what the grade of the offense shall be; it is not declared to be a crime or a misdemeanor, but it is said that a certain thing shall constitute extortion, and then in another part of the bill there is some provision for punishing it. I think it ought to be described so that the statutes upon that subject would apply.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to the amendment, but the statement that it is nowhere described to be an offense, I think, is a mistake. I acquiesce in the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment——

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from North Carolina while we are about it permit me to propose a similar amendment to the next section?

Mr. VANCE. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the same words be added at the end of section 4 where the offense of unjust discrimination is described. I move to add to the section:

Which is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE. I now offer my amendment.

The amendment was read, being to insert as a new section after section 4:

SEC. 5. That it shall be a discrimination prohibited by this act if any railroad company shall charge, demand, or receive more for any package when shipped singly than for each of a number of like packages when shipped by the car-load, or in any greater quantity or number or in any less quantity or number than a car-load, the design and intent of this act being to secure an absolute equality in rates between small and large shippers and consignees; except that a greater rate may be charged and demanded of shippers or consignees for freight shipped in less quantities than a car-load when such freight consists of horses, cattle, hogs, sheep, or other live stock, or of wheat, oats, corn, barley, or other grain shipped in bulk, and not put up in sacks, barrels, boxes, or other packages, or of pig, or bar, or slab iron, or of iron ore or other mineral ore, or of coal, coke, or coal-oil in a single tank or package to the car-load, or of lumber, logs, or firewood, or of any other commodity usually shipped or transported in bulk and by the car-load; but there shall be no difference or discrimination in rate as between shippers and consignees of the above excepted articles, whether such shipment shall be made by a single car-load or by a greater number of car-loads: Provided, That 10 per cent. may be charged and received on freight when shipped in single packages, and less than a car-load, in addition to the established charge on the same kind of goods, wares, or merchandise when shipped in like packages by the car-load, if the freight on all the articles shipped to the same consignee, to be delivered at the same point and at the same time, shall be less than $20.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, the subject of the regulation of interstate commerce by the General Government was so ably and elaborately discussed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] a few days since that I do not deem it necessary to add anything more; but I desire to say a few words in the same line in relation to this amendment.

The tendency of our financial economy is toward the concentration of capital in a few hands; and capital concentrated in a few hands has a power of its own that enables it to tyrannize over capital that is scattered in many hands and in small amounts. Now, our laws forbid absolutely the tyranny of one man over another or of any kind of restraint whatever by one man over the personal freedom of another. Why should they not, as far as possible, also forbid the tyranny of superior means over inferior means?

The prime object of our free institutions is to secure the absolute equality of all the citizens before the law. Why not complete the idea and grant them all, rich and poor, an absolute equality in methods of acquiring wealth? You may say our laws already do this; that they apply alike to all men; and if one man is more shrewd, more zealous, more frugal and wise than another, and so gets ahead of his rival in business, it can not be helped, and it is not the function of legislation to remedy the disparity. Very true this is as between private citizen and private citizen. I would not have it otherwise if I could. It would indeed be an ill-arranged moral world if success was not the reward of diligence, frugality, and industry. And it would be quite as bad an arrangement perhaps if legislation were required or even permitted to step in and prescribe the dealings between the poor and the rich, between great dealers and small ones, between wholesale and retail bargainers.

If, therefore, a capitalist can by buying largely get goods at cheaper rates than the small dealer and thus undersell him and break him down, of course this is beyond the reach of legislation, for a man may lawfully do as he will with his own. He owes no duty to the public in this regard, and the law permits him to be selfish. But railroad carriers are public servants; they are created by the public for certain purposes, and to this end they are granted certain high powers and privileges. They are invested with a portion of public sovereignty; as the law expresses it, they are affected with a public interest and owe a duty to the public. In obtaining, therefore, a portion of the public sovereignty they necessarily relinquish a portion of the rights of private citizenship, notably that of exemption from the public control of their business methods within certain reasonable limits. To give them artificial life and perpetual existence, to give them power to condemn the private property of the citizen for their use, and to give them exclusive control of the highway for their vehicles, and then permit them to go uncontrolled as absolutely as though they were private citizens in the management of their business, would be a monstrous proceeding indeed. It would be the story of Frankenstein converted into actual fact.

Therefore when capital buys and sells by the quantity to the injury of small dealers we can, in either justice or wisdom, say nothing. But when capital obtains transportation for its wares over the railroad lines of the public carriers at cheaper rates than the small dealer, by reason of the wholesale character of the freights or for any other reason, to the injury of the poorer man, then the public, through the Government, becomes a party to this injury. It then becomes an injustice and a wrong, and not a mere misfortune inevitably resulting from the laws of trade. It then becomes the duty of the public by proper legislation to redress the wrong and to restrain its agents. In vain is the attempt to justify these discriminations on business principles; as well might a judge say that he is justified in imposing a light penalty on a criminal because he was a wholesale offender, and a heavy one on the unfortunate man who is honest enough to be brought into court only occasionally.

The function of the judge is to do justice impartially. The purpose of creating these carrying corporations was to carry goods for the citizens with like impartiality. Those acquainted with the details of the daily business of the people well know that the traders of small means are absolutely at the mercy of their rivals of greater capital in all traffic where freight charges enter considerably into the cost of the article. The big fish are constantly swallowing the little ones. It is bad enough that, in the nature of things, this must be so, but I submit that it becomes an iniquity when the law, through its chartered creatures, becomes a principal party to such a proceeding.

The subject to which this bill relates constitutes in my opinion the coming question of American politics. For the next twenty years it will be discussed and examined with ever-growing interest. Many mistakes will doubtless be made in the attempt to legislate upon it with justice to the people and the corporations. But a solution of the problem will be found. It may be that this bill is one of the mistakes, but it is a step in the direction of a much-desired object. I hail its appearance as proper tentative legislation.

One thing is very certain, indeed—that the people are not going to submit quietly to a condition of things which shall make the destiny of commerce and all other methods of acquiring wealth utterly dependent on either the caprice, the forbearance, or the greed of railroad corporations, uncontrolled and uncontrollable. I confess the difficulty of legislative interference in the practical details of railroad transportation without doing as much harm probably as good. It is a highly complicated and technical business, requiring both talent and experience to comprehend it aright. The experts are constantly throwing this into the teeth of legislators and defying their ignorant efforts at a remedy for the people's complaints. However little the average legislator may know about railroad transportation in contrast with an experienced official, he yet knows enough to understand that he should try to protect the people of little means against the extortions or discriminations of incorporated capital, and that effort will continue to be made until the proper remedy is found, for the genius of the people of the race to which we belong has always been found adequate to the proper redress of all grievances which have retarded their social and material progress.

This remedy would doubtless be found sooner, and at less cost to all parties, if the great body of the carrying corporations would co-operate, as some of them have done, with the people's representatives in procuring that just and wise legislation which is so much desired. In this way their experience and great abilities could not only be made of service to the country at large, but of greatest use to the interests of their own investments; for this is the safest and surest preventive of communism and the destruction of the mob. There are no reasons but mistakenly selfish ones why railroads should not be made as popular as they are beneficent in their general tendency as the chief implement of modern progress. Their recent management has created well-grounded fears both of their effect on the just distribution of public wealth and of their influence on the freedom and purity of our institutions. Let the wise among the many very able railroad men of the country look to it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is in my judgment very important, whether regarded with reference to the principle involved in it, or considered in reference to the practical effects to flow from its adoption. I am aware, sir, that it is not likely to meet the approbation of the Senate; yet my convictions are so clear both as to its abstract justice and the great good that would come from its adoption, that I should consider that I had failed in the discharge of my duty as a Senator if I were to allow any considerations as to its popularity or any motive connected with my personal fortunes or my personal comfort and convenience to influence me to omit any effort in my power in conjunction with the Senator from North Carolina to secure for it the favorable judgment of the Senate. While, sir, I think this as to the chances of its adoption now, I have the strongest conviction that in the near future the principle on which it is based will prevail.

In all the discussion on the subject of railroad supervision it seems to be conceded on all sides that if there be one evil in railroad administration which should be remedied it is the practice of discriminating between shippers. It seems to be acknowledged by all that these institutions, in discharging the functions for which they were created, should treat all alike; giving to none advantages denied to others, and imposing on none unequal burdens, so that these great and essential agencies of commerce would be equally the servants and benefactors of every class of our people. And with this conceded universally, it seems strange that the practice of charging for goods commonly shipped in separate parcels or packages a higher rate when one or a few parcels only are shipped than when a large number are the subject of the shipment should not be as universally recognized as an unjust discrimination against the small shipper. This must arise from the application of the commercial principle, as it is recognized and acted on in transactions strictly private, to the performance of public duties by an agency which, though private in its ownership and in the profits it may gain, is nevertheless in its essence, in its creation, and in its service a public instrumentality, and subject to the supervision and control of the State.

Certainly, sir, I need not prove that railroad companies are public institutions in the service they render, and are therefore subject to regulation and control in their methods by the State. If anything is settled in American law that is settled. These companies themselves acknowledge and act on this when favors are to be granted and exceptional privileges are to be bestowed. They have been the recipients of bounties and subsidies from the Federal, as well as from State and municipal treasuries. They are the donees of the power of eminent domain, by which they lay their tracks and erect their depots wherever they will, on whose land they please, without the consent of the owner. On no other ground than that they are public institutions, created to perform a public work, useful and necessary for the public good, can these privileges or powers be claimed or granted. That is clear and undoubted law.

Then, sir, how are they to perform this service? We have assumed, sir—I believe nobody disputes that—that this service must be on reasonable charges. The bill reported by the committee assumes this and undertakes to enforce it. The bill also undertakes to prevent discriminating rates between shippers for a similar service under similar circumstances. We seem to be agreed on that. No bill, or substitute for a bill, has been introduced in either House of Congress, as far as I know, which does not provide against discrimination. The object of the amendment is solely to prevent discrimination. The question seems to be this, and this only—whether the fact that one man has a larger quantity of goods for shipment than another, but the goods of both being of the same kind and alike packed in separate parcels, and both received at the same place and shipped to the same destination, constitutes such a dissimilarity in the circumstances as will justify a railroad company in making discriminating rates, charging more per package to the smaller shipper than to the larger; or, to state the exact case in different language, whether the adoption of a rule by the railroad companies by which men of small capital shall habitually be made to pay more for the same service than is charged to their rivals in business who have larger capital is a just and proper mode of performing a public service. There seems to be but one answer to this proposition, unless we are prepared to say that a difference in wealth justifies a difference in charges, or burdens, by a public agent in favor of those who have the most of this world's goods. I do not think we are prepared to say this, nor is the country prepared to accept it as a just and proper rule of public service.

If it be said that a railroad company can transport goods more cheaply when a single person shall ship a car-load than when the car is filled by the goods of several shippers, I answer, if this be conceded, it is an argument which the railroad companies have no right to insist on, since they habitually refuse to regulate their charges by the cost of transportation. Their practice is to charge not according to the cost to them or the value to the shipper of the work done, but according to the rule of "what the traffic will bear." Cotton, corn, wheat, iron, coal, furniture, dry goods are charged different rates for the same amount of work. The division of freights into many different classes is based solely on the idea that these different classes are charged different rates for the same work. The rule of equal charges for equal work and equal cost on transportation is also habitually violated in the higher charges for short hauls between non-competitive points than for longer hauls where there is competition. This pretended rule has no existence whatever in railroad transportation. It is utterly repudiated in practice. I submit, sir, with confidence that an assumed rule, existing only in imagination, condemned and repudiated by the railroad companies in practice, can not be invoked by them to justify acts of injustice and wrong.

Sir, I am not bound to go further than to show that the railroad companies are estopped to make the argument what I have answered; yet I will do so. The amendment asks for positive interference with the business of railroad companies, and I admit that no such interference should take place for light or trivial causes, but only on grounds of great public good. I proceed now to demonstrate that the highest public good demands this interference.

No man who has given the slightest consideration to what is going on all over the civilized world can have failed to notice the centralization or concentration in commercial and industrial affairs which so strongly marks the present age, and no man who has reflected seriously on this subject has failed to perceive the great revolution it has wrought, and the still greater changes now daily going on as a consequence of it, not only in our economic system but in our social order, and even in our political institutions. A thoughtful English writer has said in a late number of McMillan's Magazine:

> Industrial concentration, above all, is the rule of the age. Steam has extinguished handicrafts, and as steam-power is most economically applied on the largest possible scale, its every development aggravates the general tendency to aggregation, to the concentration of business in larger and larger establishments, the extinction one after another of the smaller. Trade after trade is monopolized, not necessarily by great capitalists, but by great capitals. In every trade the standard of necessary size, the minimum establishment that can hold its own in competition is constantly raised. The little men are ground out, and the littleness that dooms men to destruction waxes year by year.

I regret, sir, that these uncomforting words are but too true. The condition of affairs they represent is sad and alarming. So evident is and has been their truth for years, at least to my mind, I shall beg the indulgence of the Senate to repeat what I said in this body in July, 1882, in advocacy of the proposition to remove all custom-house taxation from the tools of mechanics and implements of agriculture. I then said:

> Sir, I look with alarm at the modern tendency of affairs to destroy these independent laborers carrying on business for themselves and the absorption of all such in large workshops under a master. I fear that this tendency can not now be successfully resisted. The perfection of the many curious and useful machines to save human labor, the substitution of the steam-engine and machinery for human muscle and human intelligence, the greater efficiency of labor coming from its subdivision, all tend more and more to put all mechanical labor under the control of large capitalists in large shops. * * * We are in that era of the world's progress in which great capital employing large numbers of laborers is the rule.

I further said, on that occasion, that if this tendency to centralization in business affairs could not be successfully resisted, the evils, like all others, might be ameliorated, and the best means to do it was to foster and encourage independent workers in independent employments—small enterprises as against the overshadowing power of large establishments. I repeat that sentiment to day. I press this amendment with that object. I know, Mr. President, that large capital has a legitimate advantage over smaller means. This advantage is inherent in it. It can not be taken away. I have no wish to legislate against these advantages so far as they are legitimate and proper. They constitute the principal if not the sole incentive to the energy, enterprise, and self-denial necessary to the production of wealth. Without this enterprise, without this energy and self-denial, there can be no progress. It is the possession of these which makes the difference between an advancing and progressive people and the deadness of retrogression or the languor of a semi-civilization.

That a man will sell a million of bushels of corn or wheat, or a million yards of cloth, or a million pounds of meat, or of any other commodity, for a less sum per bushel, per yard, or per pound than he will sell a small quantity results from a necessary economic law—it is more beneficial to him. That he who is able to buy and does buy in these large quantities can buy cheaper than he who buys less results from the same law—it is more beneficial to the seller. This advantage, therefore, is inherent in the possession of large capital. No human law can take it away. The attempt to do so would be an unwarranted and, at the same time, unavailing invasion of private right—a despotic dictation in the private and personal affairs of mankind, inconsistent even with the enjoyment of private property. Nor, sir, can any human law regulate or fix the price to be paid for any commodities offered for sale in private trade, nor the price which one man may charge another for work or labor. All these must be left to the laws which govern and regulate trade and traffic among mankind, and the agreement of the parties, when they are on equal terms.

It is equally unavailing and equally violative of private and personal right to attempt to reverse by direct legislation, by positive enactments of repeal or destruction, the economic laws to which I have alluded, and which have produced the alarming tendency to concentration spoken of by the writer I have quoted and recognized as true by all thoughtful men. You can not, sir, by force of a statute decree that small enterprises, small establishments, shall be more profitable proportionately than larger ones. What has been evolved by the natural and normal operation of economic forces in the present condition of human progress and human conquest over the powers of nature must remain so until further progress, further conquest, shall produce different results.

But, sir, while we are thus impotent to reverse or repeal these economic laws and thereby arrest entirely or abrogate the present tendency to concentration and aggregation in industrial and business affairs, yet as human laws may and have increased this tendency human laws may retard it and lessen the hardships arising from it. If we can not fix the price of commodities as between private traders nor regulate the price of labor or service in private employments, we can and do accomplish this to a great extent in public employments. This bill now under consideration is an attempt to do this. The amendment is also an attempt to do this, with the superadded effect of counteracting this baneful tendency. If it be true, as we know it is, that under the present order of things the little men, little enterprises, are doomed to destruction, that the general tendency is to the aggregation and concentration of business in large and larger establishments, then it is also true that this tendency is increased and accelerated by the practice of these public institutions in adding to the weight of the already overburdened small enterprises a discriminating heavier rate in freight charges.

The little men, the little establishments, must not only contend with all the natural and inherent advantages arising from the possession by their rivals of larger capital, but they must also counteract an adventitious and inequitable superiority arising from the misuse of a public agency intended for the equal benefit of all. He who could but with difficulty stand the competition of larger capital, with its natural and inherent superior opportunities and greater equipments for the contest, is crushed by the superadded, differential burdens imposed by the railroad companies. Sir, there is no spectacle which ought to engender a warmer sympathy or a purer admiration than that field on which a man of high aspirations, yet undowered of fortune, wages with noble self-denial and tireless energy an unequal contest with inherited or acquired wealth for independence and success in life; and there is no sadder reflection than comes from the conviction that the conditions of life are such that the chances of such a man for success are diminishing more and more every year. I am not speaking now of those rare instances in which extraordinary talents and extraordinary natural endowments are seeking advancement, but of the general average of our people. What is good for them is good for the Republic; what is bad for them is bad for the Republic.

Mr. President, if society had so crystallized here into castes and classes that he who is born into one class must always remain in it, if a member of what is called the laboring classes—wage receiver—must always remain an employé receiving wages from others, I would admit that whatever would cheapen production, even this concentration and aggregation of capital, now favored if not compelled by the present system and the destruction of all smaller enterprises, would be a public good. For in that case the condition of the laboring classes would be improved in the opportunity furnished of providing comfort and necessaries at a cheaper rate. But, sir, we have not yet reached that state; it is the highest duty of statesmanship to devise measures which will prevent its coming. It has been our boast that under our institutions every child is born to all the possibilities of good fortune. We should take care that this boast is not idle.

We take a proper step in this direction when we make provision that at least in the administration of public institutions, the management of railroad companies, nothing shall be tolerated which shall make success more difficult to small enterprises, to men of small capital, in their struggle with larger establishments. We may well forego the utmost cheapness of production, possible only by the crushing out of all small enterprises, if we foster and encourage the manhood and independence of the American people by removing as far as we may the obstacles which bar success and advancement to most of them.

Mr. President, it will be a rueful day for America when the great mass of our people shall settle down in the belief that all improvement in their condition is impossible; that the prize of independence, at least, coming from the possession of that moderate degree of property necessary for the gratification of the tastes and domestic ambitions of men, can no longer be won by less than the most extraordinary abilities and the most tireless energy and the severest self-denial; which means that it is unattainable by the mass of the people. I quote from the author already referred to:

> Men covet what they may hope to win; they grudge what they are practically if not legally forbidden to attain. Hopeless intellect, despairing ambition, are dangerous in proportion to the greatness of the prizes, the insuperability of the obstacles before them. The more heavily the powder is loaded, the more probable and more destructive its explosion. Aspiring strength and courage never acquiesce in defeat. They will climb the mountain if they can; but if not, they will strive to level it.

These words are the more weighty if it shall also be accepted as true that these hard conditions result or have been hastened or fostered by the action of the Government or the practice of public instrumentalities subject to the control of the state.

Mr. President, the greater part of a frugal and laborious life has been devoted to the acquisition of that small share of capital necessary for comfort and independence. I desire to protect and shield it, not to destroy or endanger it. I know this can not be done by making or permitting it to be a despotic and unfeeling master instead of a useful servant of society. There ought to be such relations between capital and labor, between large capital and small capital, as would secure the harmonious co-operation of both and all for the common good. And in the end, in a free country with universal suffrage, this co-operation will be secured, or either capital or the free institutions will be destroyed. They can not coexist for any long period in irreconcilable antagonism.

So, sir, if I could forget the ills resulting from its misuse, if I could forget its aggressions or its failures, if I shut my eyes to the misery of the thousands of idle laborers who, from a want of harmony and co-operation between them and their employers, are suffering in penury, and would consider alone the interests of capital, I would support this or any other just measure which would tend to a greater harmony, a surer co-operation between these now antagonistic forces.

At this very moment when we are considering this important measure, these conditions which intensify this antagonism exist more generally than ever before in our history. Notwithstanding our high protective tariff, passed avowedly in the interest of American labor and the owners of small capital, our farmers, there never was more distress. Strikes, which are the protests of labor against what it considers its failure to receive a just share of the joint products of labor and capital, were never so numerous. Want, hunger, and pinching poverty have invaded the households of nearly all who depend on their labor for their daily support. Where men are not wholly without work their wages have been reduced from 20 to 30 per cent. The products of the farm have fallen to that point where they do not pay the cost of production. The farmers are unable to pay their debts; they are unable to make purchases. This reacts on the commercial and manufacturing interests of the country. The pressure is so great that only the greatest and the strongest establishments can stand.

We hear everywhere the cry of overproduction, which is but another name for underconsumption, caused by the inability of the great mass of consumers to purchase. Overproduction can not commence till all have an abundance.

I read from the New York Herald of the 21st December last the following, and ask for it the careful consideration of the Senate:

> Events have succeeded so fast in commercial and financial circles that it is difficult to keep pace with them. The universal clamor against the railroads, the continuance of business failures, the industrial depression, the disruption of the coal pool, and the general shake up in Wall street, all claim attention and are earnestly discussed.
> DEPRESSED TRADE AND IDLE WORKMEN.
> Failures are numerous as ever, and with the possible exception of cottons no improvement is reported in any branch of trade. It is pleasant to note that several iron and steel works in Ohio and Pennsylvania are to resume to-morrow after several months of idleness; but the general situation is by no means cheerful. Statistics collected by Bradstreet's in twenty-one States, which represent 90 per cent. of the manufactures of the country, indicate that 350,000 workmen are idle, and in this city alone about 55,000 industrious workers, besides several thousand clerks and salesmen, are unemployed. Of those who are at work the wages of unskilled laborers have been cut down—taking the country at large—from 20 to 30 per cent. during the current year, and skilled laborers generally are receiving from 10 to 15 per cent. less than a year ago.
> LOW PRICES OF COMMODITIES.
> Commodities have been reduced perhaps in proportion, and the "staff of life," in its crude form and at wholesale, touched the lowest price on record during the past week. Out West the farmers continue to cry out that they are not getting first cost for their crops, and the agitation against the railroads in that region is at white heat. Kansas farmers, who get but 12 cents a bushel for corn, while the railroads charge double that amount for carrying it to Chicago, are certainly confronted with a seeming injustice, and it is natural that they should call upon the roads to divide the pressure of hard times by reducing freights.

Now, Mr. President, I do not claim that all these ills come from the action of railroads in discriminating against small shippers. I call attention to these uncomforting facts more to show that our present condition is unsatisfactory and is of that sort that greatly tends to increase and intensify the antagonism between these belligerent forces. That some of these ills have been increased by this discrimination I do not doubt. It seems too clear to require argument that if there were more independent workers a fairer and more equal distribution of manufactures and business among the many, instead of this concentration in great establishments and under great capital, there would be a greater reserve fund for the community to fall back on in times of distress than there is now, or at all events this reserve fund would be more generally distributed and therefore more efficacious to ward off and remove distress.

Mr. President, if this amendment, or something like it in principle, should be adopted we might, I think, look with confidence to the following good results:

1. Small enterprises of all kinds would be encouraged and fostered, and the present tendency to divide the people of this country into two great classes, one of large or associated capital as employers and the remainder as employés, would be checked. That middle class of enterprising, energetic men, of little or no capital, who have done so much to advance our prosperity and to make our free institutions stable and orderly, and which under the present system are disappearing, would be increased not only in number but in influence and power.

2. There would be a great saving in the cost of distribution. Under the present system, as I fully pointed out on another occasion, our created wealth is largely concentrated in large cities, and from these centers both manufactures and agricultural products are distributed to the country tributary to them respectively. If small shippers were charged no more than the larger the agricultural produce of the West would go from the shipping point nearest to the place of production directly to the consumer in the South and in other States, and the expense and delay of shipping to the great cities and thence distributing to the consumer would be avoided. The producer and consumer would be brought nearer together and the profits of middlemen saved and divided between them. The producer would receive more and the consumer would pay less.

The present system of concentrating all agricultural products in the warehouses and elevators of a few large cities prior to distribution for consumption has begotten the great evil of dealing or gambling in futures, and enables a few men to make "corners," whereby the price of these products, after they have gone from the producer, is frequently raised inordinately to the consumer, and sometimes these prices are unduly depressed to the injury of the producer without corresponding benefit to the consumer. This would be checked by bringing the producer and consumer more directly together. My own State has been and is now the victim of the unequal charges sought to be remedied by the amendment, and of the higher charges for short over longer hauls, on which I commented a few days ago. The merchants and farmers of Mississippi are made to pay more on goods shipped from the North and West than consignees who receive their goods from railroads hauling them through the State. Freights from Cincinnati to New Orleans are lower than from Cincinnati to any point in Mississippi through which goods are carried on the longer trip. By the two evils combined the growth of her cities and towns and the advancement of her farmers have been sacrificed to the building up of other communities more favored in railroad transportation While, as stated in the extract from the New York Herald, the farmers of Kansas get 12 cents a bushel for their corn the consumers in Mississippi pay for it from 75 cents to $1. This great difference, amounting to from 600 to 800 per cent., is wholly lost to the producer and is largely added to the burden of the consumer over a fair and reasonable price.

4. It would be a step in the direction of having legislation in favor of labor and small capital, and would tend to dissipate a feeling and sentiment existing in too many localities and among too many persons that legislation has been and will continue to be adverse to these interests. This, sir, will be one of the most beneficent effects of the amendment.

The large and prodigal land grants made to railroad companies, and the failure of Congress to restore them to the public domain when they have become forfeited; the extra privileges granted to the banks, whereby they are said by their friends to be the "pets of Congress," the relieving them of most of the taxes once imposed on them, the effort likely to succeed to relieve them entirely, and the leaving to them the power to contract or expand the currency at will; the establishment of a gold standard, whereby the burden of debts has been greatly increased; the taxation of the commonest necessaries of life and of the implements and tools used by laborers; the extravagance and corruption in administration; the collection of a large surplus not needed for the support of the Government, are some of the things which have created the impression among the people that the Government is unduly neglectful of the interests of labor and small property-holders. This impression produces discontent; and especially is this discontent in some parts threatening to-day. The best way to remove discontent is to remove the cause. Where there is injustice and wrong there will be remonstrance and active opposition.

I quote without indorsing fully the words of a great preacher, spoken only a few days ago:

DANGERS OF ANARCHY.

Let us remember that the same social movement of the workingmen is running abreast of the new Christianity, as in the time of Wycliffe, and an old order is passing away. Liberty has degenerated into license; self-interest has turned out selfishness; natural law has left us no place for moral law; the right of might has legitimized a new tyranny; laissez faire has resulted in chronic crises. If my buggy is constantly breaking down, I know it is time to get a new one. So when our commercial system comes to a standstill every ten years it is time to have a new one. Bradstreet's is authority for the statement that 300,000 are out of work in our most favored land. There is danger of anarchy to-day, and any one who reads the wild and fiendish utterances at Chicago on Thanksgiving Day may see the danger.

Power and wealth may try repression. Now, there is nothing quite so sure, of creating an explosion as to pile the weights on the safety-valve when there is a furious pressure of steam on. That may come in the nineteenth century, as in the fourteenth. That will come unless relief is found for the forces of discontent.

And you large-minded men of business, see to it that no irritation springing out of the intolerant and disagreeable attitude which labor may assume to-day in its consciousness of power shall prevent you from doing your duty. See to it that the standard of the age which is held up before the advancing army of humanity is none other than the form of the Carpenter's Son.

He sees danger more imminent than I do, yet I confess there is that in the present condition of affairs which ought to make us pause and reflect whether in our rapid strides to and eager pursuit of great wealth we are not sacrificing to magnificence and splendor in outward appearances the real interests of the great mass of the people, upon whose labor, intelligence, and thrift all substantial progress depends.

I am sure, sir, that nothing can do more to remove discontent and to break down any incipient spirit of anarchic socialism than the conviction, if it should prevail, that the American Congress is doing and is disposed to do all that may rightly and constitutionally be done to make the operations of the Government equal to all in its benefits and in its burdens. The adoption of this amendment would aid in producing this conviction, and it would aid also the struggling weak in their unequal contest with the strong, by establishing a just equality in a public service.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I desire to offer the following amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina:

And be it further enacted, That no merchant shall sell a larger package or quantity of goods at a smaller per cent. than he charges for a smaller package of goods of like quality if the goods have been produced in or transported from another State so as to fall within the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia proposes an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That no merchant shall sell a larger package or quantity of goods at a smaller per cent. than he charges for a smaller package of goods of like quality, if the goods have been produced or transported from another State so as to fall within the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

Mr HOAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 9, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Right Rev. H. A. NEELY, D. D., Bishop of Maine.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I rise for the purpose of moving to dispense with the morning hour, so as to bring before the House for consideration the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for one moment.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

JOHN W. FRANKLIN.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 491) for the relief of John W. Franklin, executor of the last will of John Armfield, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay John W. Franklin, executor of the estate of John Armfield, late of the county of Grundy and State of Tennessee, $18,000.21, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; it being the proceeds of $30,000.36 in legal money taken from the Bank of Louisiana, at New Orleans, La., by Capt. J. W. McClure, assistant quartermaster, under military order No. 202, and by him turned over to Col. S. B. Holabird, chief quartermaster of that department, and by him disbursed; and such payment shall be in full of all claims from any source upon the Government for repayment of said moneys.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the report should be read.

Mr. TALBOTT. I will state that the report in this case is quite a lengthy one. The bill has been twice reported and passed in the Senate. It has been unanimously reported by the Committee on War Claims of this House, and a similar bill is pending before the House.

Mr. DIBRELL. The bill simply proposes to give to a lady money captured from her husband and paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to state that I have examined the claim and I think it is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. TALBOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATHAN H. DUNPHE.

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 754) for the relief of Nathan Y. Dunphe, of Bridgewater, in the State of Massachusetts, and that it be now put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Nathan Y. Dunphe, of Bridgewater, in the State of Massachusetts, the sum of $9,370, in full compensation for fifty hogsheads of sugar which were seized in the State of Louisiana, in the year 1862, by the military authorities of the United States, turned over to the Quartermaster's Department, and properly accounted for by that department.

The following amendments were reported by the Committee on War Claims:

In line 5, strike out "Y" and insert "H."
In line 6, strike out "$9,370" and insert "$2,400."
In line 8, strike out "50" and insert "25."
In line 10, strike out "1862" and insert "1863."
Amend the title so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Nathan H. Dunphe, of Bridgewater, in the State of Massachusetts."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RANDALL. Is there a report accompanying it?

Mr. LONG. There is a report. The bill is reported unanimously by the committee. If it is desired the report may be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. ROWELL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 754) for the relief of Nathan H. Dunphe, have had the same under consideration, and report as follows:

Nathan H. Dunphe, a citizen of Massachusetts, engaged in trade in Louisiana at the breaking out of the war, and was the owner of two lots of sugar of fifty hogsheads each. One lot has already been paid for by the Government, but owing to a lack of evidence as regards the other lot, until after the passage of a bill for his relief, the second lot was not included under the evidence before us. It is now certain that twenty-five hogsheads, weighing upon an average 1,200 pounds, and worth at the lowest price 7¼ cents per pound, were taken by the proper seizing officer of the Army, under command of Maj. Gen. N. P. Banks, in May, 1863, and sent to New Orleans and turned over to the proper officer.

This sugar was in a public warehouse at Port Barre, La. All sugar in that vicinity appears to have been seized under orders.

Dunphe was a loyal citizen, and ought to be paid.

The remainder of his sugar was destroyed in a storm, so as not to be marketable, and was not sent to New Orleans, but was taken and used by the soldiers. This we do not allow.

We therefore recommend that the bill do pass, with the following amendments:

In lines 6 and 7 strike out the words "nine thousand three hundred and seventy" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two thousand four hundred;" and in line 8 strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "twenty-five;" and in lines 9 and 10 strike out the word "sixty-two" and insert the word "sixty-three."

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask a single question, whether it appears from the testimony that the proceeds of this sugar sent to New Orleans were paid into the Treasury.

Mr. LONG. It appears from the report that it was accounted for by the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is desirable that that fact should clearly appear.

Mr. LONG. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL], who reported the bill, can state what is the fact.

Mr. ROWELL. The sugar was turned over and accounted for at New Orleans, and used by the proper officers for the use of the Army.

Mr. McMILLIN. Was there a portion of this given as a reward for information at the time of the seizure?

Mr. ROWELL. Not in any way. It was only applied for the use of the Army.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This bill is of the nature of a number of similar cases now pending.

Mr. HUNT. All of the same nature ought to pass.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is of the nature of a great many claims, some of which are from my own section, and not one of them has received the attention of the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to object, but as to all this class of claims the fundamental principle has prevailed that in passing bills to refund money it should be made clear that the money has gone into the Treasury. The fact that here it has been accounted for does not appear definitely. I do not, however, wish to object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read "A bill for the relief of Nathan H. Dunphe."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a matter of privilege. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EVANS] is stated in the RECORD of Wednesday last as having been paired with myself upon the pension appropriation bill. I was present and voted in favor of that measure, not understanding the pair to extend beyond last week. The gentleman from Pennsylvania understood otherwise. If he had been present he would have voted for the pension appropriation bill, and desires to have it so stated.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr PERKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 737) to remove the political disabilities of J. R. Waddy, of Virginia; and

HARBOR OF REFUGE AT LUDINGTON, MICH.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, inclosing report of board of engineers of a preliminary survey for a harbor of refuge at Ludington, Mich.; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. THOMAS WILLIAMS, of Alabama, in place of Mr. Shelley, as a member of the Select Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics.

COLUMBIAN INSTITUTION FOR DEAF AND DUMB.

The SPEAKER also announced the appointment, under statutory provision, of Mr. TUCKER and Mr. RYAN to fill vacancies in the offices of directors on the part of the House of Representatives of the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SUMNER, of California, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence until Monday next, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana calls for the regular order, which, this being Friday, is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move to dispense with that order for the present. If this motion be adopted I shall move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year which will expire the 1st of next July. I need not state to the House that the appropriations for the naval service expired on the 1st of the present month, and the Naval Department to-day is unable to expend a dollar for any purpose. This bill, I apprehend, will take but a very few moments for its consideration, and I hope there will be no objection to my motion.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will ask the indulgence of the House to say in response to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] that during this session no part of any private bill day has been devoted to the consideration of private bills. There are hundreds of reports——

Mr. HUTCHINS. The gentleman will allow me to make a suggestion. I appreciate his objection, and under the circumstances of the case I will ask that unanimous consent be given to proceed with private business to-morrow, devoting that day to this business if the order of private business should be dispensed with to-day. I think there will be no objection to that.

Mr. McMILLIN. I believe it is indicated that one gentleman will object.

Mr. HUTCHINS. No; there is no objection.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have made a similar arrangement once or twice before, and it has come to naught. My only desire is to obtain consideration of these private measures. I think we ought to consider them. The Appropriations Committee can occupy to-morrow as well as they can to-day. I fear that if private business be dispensed with to-day we may have an adjournment over or some other difficulty, as we have had in the past, to prevent the consideration of these private claims. There are hundreds of them upon the Calendar. Either these claimants are to have no consideration of their cases at all by this Congress, or they must have it soon. It is for this House to determine whether it will lend an ear at all to these claimants.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, it is desirable that the naval appropriation bill should be passed to-day. I do not think it will occupy half an hour—certainly not an hour. The bill represents the unanimous judgment of the Committee on Appropriations, so far as I am able to learn. For one I shall be glad if the time taken from the consideration of private business to-day by reason of the consideration of the naval bill be given to the Private Calendar to-morrow. There will not, I think, be an adjournment over, because the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill is now ready to be called up.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the bill he desires to bring up is not the bill making appropriations for the Navy for the residue of the fiscal year?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. Have we not already pending in the Senate two bills making such appropriations?

Mr. RANDALL. There are three.

Mr. McMILLIN. And now we are to have a quartet, it seems.

Mr. REED. They want to make the appropriations in slices.

Mr. RANDALL. We think that the bill now presented as a new measure in a spirit of harmony, and in order to bring about co-operation between the two Houses, will meet the concurrence of the Senate; at least we hope so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] to ask the postponement of private business for the purpose merely of considering and passing the appropriation bill. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman's motion sought to dispense entirely with the consideration of private business to-day.

Mr. HUTCHINS. That was not my intention.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not like to be unreasonable in this matter, but it seems to me that this appropriation bill could as well go over until to-morrow for consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. The idea was to have it passed to-day so as to go over to the Senate, where it could be passed to-morrow; otherwise it will have to go over until Monday next.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the House is willing to give unanimous consent and will agree also to substitute to-morrow for to-day for the consideration of business of the Private Calendar, with the further understanding that there shall be a session to-morrow, I do not feel disposed to interpose further objection to the consideration of the appropriation bill suggested by the gentlemen from New York; but I give notice, Mr. Speaker, that I shall hereafter insist that at least one day in the week shall be devoted, as the rules have provided, for the consideration of business of the Private Calendar.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I give notice, Mr. Speaker, that I shall object to any such arrangement. I am chairman of a committee which has had no proper consideration for the business which has been reported from it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Very well then; I shall insist on going on with the private business, which under the rules has been set apart for this day, and then will leave the matter to the determination of the best judgment of the House.

Mr. HUTCHINS. This bill will take but little time.

Mr. McMILLIN. But the gentleman from New York forgets that at 5 o'clock we take a recess until 8 this evening for the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. HUTCHINS. The time consumed in this discussion would have sufficed to have disposed of this naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection having been made, there is nothing before the House.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move to dispense with the private business for to-day, giving notice that it is my intention to call up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. The motion to dispense with the morning hour will require a vote of two-thirds?

The SPEAKER. It will.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 80.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I will not call for tellers, but will give notice, Mr. Speaker, that to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal,

I shall ask the House to proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been called for, committees will now be called for reports of a private nature.

NATIONAL BANK, BLOOMINGTON, ILL.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 7768) to authorize the National Bank of Bloomington, Ill., to change its name to the First National Bank of Bloomington, Ill.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying Senate report, ordered to be printed.

RICHARD C. RIDGWAY.

Mr. HERBERT, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, as a substitute for H. R. 4598, a bill (H. R. 7875) for the relief of Richard C. Ridgway and others; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

SAM C. REID.

Mr. CLEMENTS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back adversely the joint resolution (H. Res. 76) to authorize the Secretary of State to reimburse Sam C. Reid for certain expenditures; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. RANDLE.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back the bill (H. R. 6836) for the relief of William H. Randle; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH C. CREIGHTON.

Mr. CURTIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIN. I am also instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back with the recommendation that it be adopted the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas this House, by resolution of the 7th day of June, 1884, requested the Secretary of State to inform this House of the mode and manner, in detail, of the expenditure of the amounts appropriated by Congress for the expenses of the French and American Claims Commission, stating when, where, to what persons, and for what purposes the moneys so appropriated had been paid, and also what amounts had been paid by the French Government for the expenses of said commission; and

Whereas on the 25th day of June, 1884, there was laid before this House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State inclosing a statement of the expenditures of said commission under general headings, without stating the details of said expenditures and without any statement as to the times when, places where, and persons to whom the moneys appropriated had been paid, as was required by the said resolution: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to inform this House of the mode and manner, in full detail, of the expenditure of the sums, amounting in all to $325,000, appropriated by Congress for the expenses of said French and American Claims Commission, stating specifically when, where, to what persons, and for what purposes the moneys so appropriated have been paid, giving in each case the date and amount of the payment, the name of the person to whom such amount was paid, and the object for which the payment was made; and also whether the officers of said commission, or any of them, continued in the exercise of their functions after the date fixed by treaty for the conclusion of such commission, and of the labors thereof; and, if so, how long and by what authority of law they so continued, what services they performed, and what payments were made them for the same.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CURTIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, if there be no objection, I desire that we begin, on page 28 of the Calendar, with the bill (H. R. 4679) for the relief of Sarah E. Webster.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire whether that is the first bill in order.

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire that the bills standing before this on the Calendar be passed over informally for various reasons—absence of members interested or on similar grounds.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to taking up first for consideration the bill indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN]?

There was no objection.

SARAH E. WEBSTER.

The Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar proceeded accordingly to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4679) for the relief of Sarah E. Webster, administratrix.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Sarah E. Webster, of the city of Buffalo, N. Y., administratrix, &c., of Isaac A. Verplank, deceased, late a judge of the superior court of Buffalo, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of money which was assessed as the income tax and was collected from and paid by said Isaac A. Verplank, now deceased, to the Government of the United States, upon his salary as a judge of the superior court of Buffalo, N. Y., such tax having been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of avoiding interruption of the current business, I suggest that the report in each case be read without it being particularly called for.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana calls for the reading of the report in this case.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was suggesting the propriety of having the report read in all cases without a special call being made for the reading.

Mr. McMILLIN. Some of these reports are very long, and time might be saved by a statement of the case in lieu of the reading of the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. In such cases, if it be desired, the reading can be specially waived.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana calls for the reading of this report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 4679:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom has been referred H. R. 1038, respectfully report:

It appears that under the law of the United States assessing a tax upon incomes the tax was assessed on the income of Isaac A. Verplank arising out of his salary as a judge of the State of New York. The tax was paid.

After the payment the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Collector vs. Day (11 Wallace, 113), decided such tax upon the salary of a judge of a State to be unconstitutional. The tax was therefore unconstitutionally exacted from a citizen, and should be refunded.

The committee therefore report a substitute for the bill referred authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund so much to the administratrix of said Verplank as shall appear to have been paid upon an assessment of the income tax upon his salary as a judge of the State of New York.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am very reluctant to interrupt the progress of business on this Calendar; but I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER], who I believe reported the bill, to two considerations which the case suggests. In the first place, it does not appear from this report that at the time of the payment of this money any objection was made to the payment. In other words, there is presented here at best but an equitable claim, not a legal one. Even if the Government of the United States were subject without special authority to be sued, or if this citizen had authority of law to go into the Federal courts with his claim, the action, as my friend from Virginia is well aware, could not be maintained, as the money was not paid under such circumstances as would entitle the party to a refund.

My second suggestion is this: If I remember correctly, an act was passed a number of years ago providing for refunding, within a definite period of time, money assessed upon and collected from State officers as tax upon income. That act, I think, prescribed some period within which claims should be made, and that time, of course, has expired. I am not able at this moment to refer to that act or to state when it was enacted, how long it remained in force, and whether the expiration of the time limited by the statute was declared to constitute a complete bar. But according to my recollection there was such a statute; and if there was, does my friend from Virginia think it proper that the bar created by a Congressional enactment should be overridden in every successive case presented without any particular reason being given for it? It is to this matter that I wish to call the attention of my friend.

Mr. TUCKER rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say, however, before my friend takes the floor, that I do not think this Government should be held responsible and necessarily bound even in equity to make an appropriation for the purpose of refunding in all cases taxes improperly paid. No government, so far as I am aware, does that. I venture to say that the government of Virginia, bound to as high a faith to its citizens as the Government of the United States to its citizens, does not under similar circumstances refund money paid by a citizen in the form of tax.

Questions of this kind are constantly springing up under the interpretation of our customs laws. The law being construed as imposing a given duty upon an article, that duty is paid; but by a subsequent decision the article is declared not subject to the payment of such duty, and the party comes to Congress asking that the money be refunded. I think that in all this class of cases the Federal Government, if it makes repayment, should do so under exactly the same conditions that a State government or an individual citizen would make repayment. Where money is paid to the Government, not under protest, but voluntarily, I do not see any reason why the time of Congress should be constantly occupied to a large extent in the consideration of measures for the refund of the money. But in this case there is the further point that there was a day in court for this claimant. I think the time fixed by a general statute for the presentation of claims of this description has elapsed; and if I am correct as to this, there is now a complete bar to this claim, and I insist that the statute should not be disturbed.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that my friend from Indiana should make any objection to the passage of this bill. I supposed that all parties are agreed that the Government ought not to collect any more from the people of the country than it needs, and I had supposed that my friend from Indiana especially would agree with me that the Government has no right to exact from a citizen what the Constitution forbids. Now, this tax was paid, if I mistake not, some time in the year 1868. At that time there had been no decision made on the question of the unconstitutionality of such a tax. It is a tax on a State officer. It had long ago been decided that no State should tax any of the State officers or any of the officers of the Federal Government. In the case of Collector vs. Day it was decided for the first time that the Federal Government should not tax any State officer, that it could not impair the functions of the State by taxing any of its instrumentalities. Now, at the time of the payment of this tax that decision had not been made. It was made in 1871. There was no day in court for the party to object or protest, and it was only after that decision that the application was made. The question for the House to decide is this, whether they will refund that money held for sixteen years; whether they will pay back the principal of the money taken without interest; whether they will refund money unconstitutionally exacted according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. And that is the whole question.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Virginia has not met the point which is the important one in this case, and upon which I have dwelt in the remarks submitted by me in the House.

Mr. TUCKER. So far as the protest is concerned, I understand that is only a customs regulation. I do not think there is any such provision in reference to internal-revenue taxes. But even, sir, if there were, I hold, when the question is presented where the Government has put its hands into the pockets of a citizen against the Constitution of the country, Congress is bound to refund it whether there was a protest at the time or not.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend has not met the main objection I have raised on this bill, and that is that this claim is barred by statute.

Mr. TUCKER. There is no statute against it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point I have raised is this: That there is now by statute a bar against the payment of any such claim, and that if it is right to open that bar as to one case it is right to open it up as to all citizens who have similar claims.

Mr. TUCKER. I think so, too.

Mr. HOLMAN. And my friend from Virginia must know there are a number of such claims pending before the House, and have been pending for years.

Mr. TUCKER. Yes; I know that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then if it is proper to remove the bar under the statute as to one case it is certainly only equitable and just the bar should be removed as to all other like cases. Now, my friend has protested as much as, if not more than, any other member upon this floor against class legislation.

Mr. TUCKER. Yes; against class legislation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not special, but class legislation; that is, legislation affecting a single party and not applying to a general class of persons. If it be proper that this bill should pass removing the bar as to this one special case, then it is proper and right to remove the bar as to all the other similar cases.

I hold in my hand the statute to which I referred. It is not the statute to which I thought I was referring at the time. My impression has always been that Congress, after the court decided it could not impose an income tax on the salaries of State officers, passed an act providing for the refunding of the amounts collected, provided the claims therefor were made within a given time. I believe the time fixed was two years. I may be mistaken. The statute to which I wish to call attention now may be the one to which I have referred. It is section 3228, as follows:

All claims for the refunding of any internal tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, or of any penalty alleged to have been collected without authority, or of any sum alleged to have been excessive, or in any manner wrongfully collected, must be presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue within two years next after the cause of action accrued: Provided, That claims which accrued prior to June 6, 1872, may be presented to the Commissioner at any time within one year from said date. But nothing in this section shall be construed to revive any right of action which was already barred by any statute on that date.

That statute of course set up a bar against all these claims some time in the year 1870. I believe that none of these assessments were made later than 1868, although I may be wrong about that. After some thirteen or fourteen years have elapsed since the statute became a bar to these claims, I submit to my friend whether it is right to remove that bar against a particular case when it stands upon the same footing as the other cases? He does not pretend to show some special reason why Congress in equity should disregard the bar of the statute; he has assigned no special reason for it, but simply states that the assessment was paid by a State officer, and the law under which that assessment was made has been declared to be unconstitutional. He gives no special reason why the limitation of the statute should be set aside. I submit, therefore, Congress should not go on year after year enacting statutes of limitation, and then in every single case, without assigning any special reason, disregard the bar of the statute. If it is to be disregarded in this case it ought to be in every other. I expected when the report was read it would assign some good reason why in this case the bar should be removed, but nothing of that kind has been presented.

Mr. TUCKER. The views of the gentleman from Indiana are very technical, to be sure. He would plead the statute of limitations against a claim made by a citizen for the refunding of an unconstitutional tax. The statute of limitations to which he refers is one in reference to applications to the Internal-Revenue Department, which must have been made within two years in order to enable the party to bring suit for recovery under that particular statute. The statute of limitations, however, according to his own statement, ran out in 1870, and before the decision was made by the Supreme Court covering the case in point. Therefore the bar of limitation does not apply in the present instance.

The decision I have before me, Mr. Chairman, is one of the most remarkable that has ever been made by the Supreme Court—a decision that was delivered with great unanimity, one judge only dissenting. The opinion delivered by Judge Nelson declares in the most unequivocal terms that it is utterly beyond the power of Congress to lay a tax upon a judicial officer of a State. This case now before us relates to a judicial officer of the eighth district of New York. It was an effort on the part of the Government to impair the power of the State to carry on its judicial functions; and now when the administrator of that officer comes and asks that this tax, unconstitutionally collected, be refunded, the Government pleads the statute of limitations. Well, that is all I have to say about it. I think that is enough. I will not plead the statute of limitations against the claim of a citizen, a claim that he makes for money wrung from him against the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that I will now be indulged for a few moments.

Mr. TUCKER. By the way, my friend says that I am much opposed to class legislation, and I wish to say a word in response to that. I answer, yes, I am, where it is for the benefit of a class; but where such legislation is to relieve a class against an unconstitutional exaction I favor it.

The gentleman says why not make the bill applicable to all these classes; why not make it broader? Will he vote for the bill if I do make it broader? I ask the gentleman for an answer.

Mr. HOLMAN (from his seat). I will answer in due time.

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir; I hope so. I would like to have an answer. Now, sir, I will pass any bill, I will report any bill in behalf of any citizen of this country for the refunding to him of an unconstitutional exaction; but I did not propose a general bill because there was no application for it. I only reported upon the bill which was referred to the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust I will be indulged for a few moments, because this question is not now for the first time before the House. There are thousands, I may say in bounds tens of thousands, of just such claims throughout the country, for, if I am correct in my remembrance, the assessment was made under the act of 1862, which was the act embracing the income tax, and applied to and embraced all State officers, whether judicial, legislative, or executive. Of course in a vast number of cases the amount paid under the act was small. But as a matter of course the salaries were taken only into account in making up the amount of income tax paid.

A comparatively small amount of the money thus collected has been refunded up to this time; and the great body of the claims were refunded perhaps for the reason mentioned by my friend from Virginia, that is, that the law has not been declared unconstitutional until a comparatively late date, and few claims had been presented, and if they had been the statute of two years' limitation constituted a complete bar.

This case is exactly analogous to the cotton-claims cases except in reference to its magnitude. Does my friend take the position of refunding the cotton claims? I do not understand him to occupy that position. That tax was illegally collected, as everybody knows, or as is generally understood. No law has been ever enacted to provide for its refunding, and I presume none ever will be; and yet here we are asked to take up a single case—a case selected out of the great body of men who paid the tax—and let Congress afford him relief. This I regard as certainly not the part of wisdom on the part of Congress. It is bad legislation. If there is to be legislation to affect large bodies of men let it be general in its character and not special. I do not believe that it would be a wise policy on the part of Congress now, after the lapse of fourteen years, to make provision for the refunding of this tax. I do not think that the public interests would be promoted. The tax has been paid. The objection to it is that the Constitution did not authorize Congress to levy such a tax. But if Congress attempts to correct all the mistakes which were made, and the errors committed in regard to revenue and taxation during the period of the war and afterward, your Treasury can not bear the drain, or any other treasury that we have ever had. So far as I know, the great body of persons who paid the tax did not claim this refund.

I believe there is a bill pending in the Senate to extend the bar one or two years; and if any law is to be passed upon the subject it should be some such provision as that and not a special case selected such as this from the great body of such claims.

Besides, my friend must remember that his committee did not properly have cognizance of this subject. It belongs to the Committee on Claims, not to the Committee on the Judiciary. It only went to the Judiciary Committee by a special order of the House and not under the rules of the House; and for the reason that it is a single case, a solitary exception referred to that committee, it has been taken up and reported upon, when possibly under other circumstances some general provision might have been formulated. Had this bill gone to one of the committees overburdened with business of the same character, it would not probably have been taken up and made a special exception to the mass of such cases, leaving the rest of them unacted upon to sleep the sleep that knows no waking. Let us have something like uniformity in our legislation and let us adopt wise business principles in dealing with a subject of this character.

Mr. HAMMOND. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana, Will you vote for this bill if it is amended by making it general, so as to cover all such cases?

Mr. HOLMAN. I attempted to express the reasons why I do not think it would be to the public interest, or even to the interest of the claimants themselves, to do so.

Mr. HAMMOND. You think it honest to pay the debt, but not politic?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think that we can undertake to correct all the mistakes of legislation enacted under the revenue laws during the war; and I think if you attempt it by legislation you will find raids will be made on the Treasury far beyond what the benefit possibly could be to individual citizens by the refunding of amounts that would be demanded. These matters have been acquiesced in for so many years that it does not now appear to me to be the part of wisdom to open them up.

Mr. TUCKER. Only one word. My friend from Indiana has introduced a new plea, a plea in abatement—that this case ought not to have been referred to the Judiciary Committee. I will say to the gentleman as the cause is now at issue it is too late to allow the plea in abatement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I admit that.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman, of course, as a good lawyer, knows that. Therefore that is out of the case. I put the issue where I put it before, that no just government will hold on not only to an unjust tax but a tax which its own courts decided it had no right to exact, even though there be a statute of limitations to protect it. And I want the gentleman to stand up here and say that he is willing to hold on to what the government had no right to exact under the Constitution, though it is proved you have it in your pocket and you have held it there all that time. And we only ask the principal, not the interest.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is not the only instance where that occurs. Will the gentleman allow me another moment?

Mr. TUCKER. I want to close the case, but I yield to the gentleman for a moment longer.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman alluded to my suggestion that this case went to his committee instead of the proper committee, the Committee on Claims. I made that remark for the purpose of suggesting to my friend from Virginia that he was treating this as if it was the only claim of the kind. If it was the only one no member would occupy time in objecting to its consideration. But let me inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], the chairman of the Committee on Claims, how many of these cases are pending before his committee?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not remember that we have had occasion to consider any of this class of claims.

Mr. TUCKER (to Mr. HOLMAN). You have had your answer.

Mr. HOLMAN. And how many are pending before the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not know about that. There may be some cases of this kind pending before the Committee on Claims. There have been nearly a thousand bills referred to that committee. We have been able to report on probably half of them—I do not remember the exact number. But I do not remember one involving this question. There is a bill pending there for returning to the States taxes collected from individuals in the States, but that is not the question involved here.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; that is not the question. It is very possible that the practice has been to refer these bills to the Committee on Ways and Means. That would seem to be the appropriate committee to consider questions growing out of the revenue. I do not at this moment see any gentleman whom I recognize as belonging to that committee. But I know from former experience on the committee of which my friend from Tennessee is chairman that a very large number of these cases have been pending for many years.

Mr. MCMILLIN. My attention having been called to it, I desire to state that we have a claim of this kind in favor of a party who was at the time a resident of Louisiana, where a sum of about $12,000 was involved. Mrs. Adelicia Cheatham now, then Mrs. Acklen, paid illegally assessed taxes, and paid them under protest. She went to the Court of Claims, and the court decided she was entitled to the relief and ought to have had it. But following the advice of her attorney, probably, she had been a few days late in commencing her action. That claim we thought was eminently proper to be paid, and we have recommended the payment; and I shall be surprised if this House does not stand by the action of the committee under the circumstances. It was an illegally collected tax upon cotton, cotton that had already paid 11 per cent. taxes. Then there was an illegal tax assessed in addition to that. The Court of Claims held, I think, that the taxes ought to have been returned, but that the remedy was not sought in time, and she shows a reason for not having sought it in time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think when it comes to be a question of bar, whether the statute of limitations shall act upon Congress or not, then it is equitable to consider the circumstances under which the claim is presented. And I have called attention to the fact that no excuse in this case is given for the failure to present it in reasonable time. If we are to enact bars to operate on our courts of justice, I insist the same bars should operate on Congress. But where a case of equity is presented, that bar should be waived.

Mr. TUCKER. I am willing to leave the issue to the jury on the plea of the statute of limitations. If the House is willing to put in what, without disrespect to my friend from Indiana, I must call the dishonest plea of the statute of limitations to the claim of a party who comes forward and says, "You have exacted a tax which your own courts declare to be unconstitutional," I am willing to leave the House to take that course.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have a vote on it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that recently in this House a majority of members voted in favor of the payment of untold millions to a certain numerous class of voters in this country; and to the further fact that the main objection urged to the payment of this debt to-day is that the United States Government is not able to pay what it honestly owes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass?

The question was decided in the affirmative; there being—ayes 99, noes 14.

Mr. HOLMAN. As a very large majority of the House has voted in favor of this measure, I will not insist on a quorum.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title of the next bill in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 130) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is one of the bills which by consent were passed over informally not to lose their place on the Calendar. There were six such bills passed over under the agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. It will require unanimous consent to pass over this bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I make the point, Mr. Chairman, that by consent we commenced to-day with the bill just acted on, passing over informally the six preceding bills, so that we should now go forward with the other bills on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is mistaken as to the order agreed to by the committee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That was the motion I made; the Chair may have misunderstood it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair put the request as to one bill only.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then I ask unanimous consent that the six bills preceding the one just acted on be laid aside informally without losing their place.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

CAMP DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1782) to authorize the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department certain parts of the Camp Douglas military reservation, in the Territory of Utah.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to relinquish and turn over to the Department of the Interior, for restoration to the public domain, such parts of what is known as the Camp Douglas military reservation, in the Territory of Utah, as are embraced in the claim of Mr. Charles Popper; the same being in accordance with the recommendations of the board of officers, comprised of I. N. Palmer, colonel Second Cavalry, president of the board; F. F. Flint, colonel Fourth Cavalry; and George O. Weber, first lieutenant Fourth Infantry, recorder, constituted for the purpose of examining the claim of the said Charles Popper, by order of Brigadier-General Crook, dated Omaha, Nebr., May 7, 1875, and approved by the Secretary of War, and described as follows, namely: The northwest quarter of the southeast quarter, and the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter, and the northwest fractional quarter of the southwest fractional quarter, and the norht half of the southeast quarter of the southwest fractional quarter, and the north fractional half of the southwest fractional quarter of the southwest fractional quarter of section 33, township 1 north, range 1 east of the Salt Lake meridian, containing in all one hundred and fifty-one and eighty one-hundredths acres, more or less, and all lying within the said Camp Douglas military reservation.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior, after said restoration, shall, at the expense of said Charles Popper, cause the lands to be surveyed and segregated from the reservation by the surveyor-general of Utah; and that at any time within ninety days after the restoration of the lands the said Charles Popper shall be permitted to make a private entry of the said lands at the rate of $1.25 per acre; and during the ninety days no other person or persons shall be permitted to make an entry of the same, or to commence any proceedings to obtain title thereto under the homestead law or any other laws by which the lands of the United States are disposed of: Provided, That the money paid by Charles Popper for the survey of the land, as hereinbefore provided for, shall be deducted from the cost of the entry thereof.

Mr. DIBRELL. The report in this case is quite lengthy, and I desire to make a statement which I think may obviate the necessity for reading it. This bill was reported favorably by me in the Forty-sixth Congress and passed the House. In the Forty-fifth Congress it had passed the Senate. At the last session of the present Congress a similar bill passed the Senate, and it is now upon the Speaker's table. This man Popper had bought a head-right, and when the Camp Douglas military reservation was surveyed the survey included his head-right. He had previously expended $15,000 or $20,000 in making improvements with a view to establishing a dairy near Salt Lake City. Every officer who has been in command of that department, including General Sheridan and others, has recommended the passage of this bill. It has also been recommended by the Secretary of War. The measure has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. I presume under these circumstances the reading of the report will not be insisted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

EDWARD BYRNE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 75) for the relief of Edward Byrne.

Mr. ROSECRANS. The gentleman [Mr. LAIRD] who, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, has this bill in charge is now confined to his room in consequence of a severe accident. I ask, therefore, that this bill be passed over informally without losing its place on the Calendar.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope that will be done.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside informally without losing its place.

There was no objection.

JOHN M. DORSEY AND WILLIAM F. SHEPARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 948) for the relief of John M. Dorsey and William F. Shepard.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $9,021.33 to John M. Dorsey, and the sum of $3,746.66 to William F. Shepard, in full settlement for beef and supplies furnished certain volunteer troops by said Dorsey, Shepard, and one S. B. Wallace, while said troops were engaged in quelling the Indian disturbances in the Territory of Utah, now the State of Nevada, in the year 1860.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the report in this case had better be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LORE, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report:

This bill has been five times favorably reported in the Senate and passed the Senate three times. It has also been three times favorably reported in the House of Representatives. No adverse report has ever been made upon it.

The bill directs the payment to John M. Dorsey of $9,021.33, and to William F. Shepard $3,746.66, in full settlement for beef and supplies furnished the troops by Wallace, Dorsey, and Shepard in quelling the Indian disturbances in the Territory of Utah, now the State of Nevada, in the year 1860.

In the spring of 1860 the Piute Indians murdered several citizens in Carson Valley, and had assembled a large hostile force, threatening the various towns in that vicinity. An irregular force of the best citizens of Virginia and Carson cities was organized and proceeded against the Indians, but they were ambushed and defeated, and about sixty of their number, including Major Dunsby, their commander, and many other prominent citizens, were killed, and the others dispersed. Great alarm followed among the citizens of these and neighboring towns from attack by the hostile Indians, who had assembled in large force. The citizens were without arms or supplies. There were no troops, arms, or Government stores or supplies nearer than Salt Lake, five or six hundred miles distant. Under the circumstances the governor of California and the United States officer in command of the Department of the Pacific sent forward to Virginia City arms and ammunition in charge of proper officers, together with one company of infantry. Several hundred volunteers were organized, armed, and equipped, and placed under the command of Col. John C. Hayes, who, in conjunction with the company of United States troops, marched against the Indians, and after some severe fighting defeated them and conquered a peace.

Upon the organization of these forces they were without stores or supplies, and were unable to move without them. Colonel Hayes and the commissary of his command made contracts with Jordan & McPike to furnish beef, and with Dorsey and Shepard and S. B. Wallace to furnish and transport for the command flour, sugar, coffee, and other stores. Three vouchers were issued by the commissary of the expedition: one to S. B. Wallace for $1,528; one to Dorsey, Wallace, and Shepard for $5,050; and the third to the same parties for $6,190. Wallace assigned all his interests to Dorsey in 1861 and died in 1862; and there is due said Dorsey the sum of $9,021.33 and to said Shepard $3,746.66. It is claimed that the prices charged were the lowest cash prices at the time and places, and the goods were furnished in good faith. The United States received the benefit of these supplies, and the Government was probably saved hundreds of thousands of dollars by the prompt and patriotic action of these claimants.

The facts are all clearly proven by the evidence of Colonel Hayes and others.

On June 17, 1874, an act was approved directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay John M. McPike the sum of $19,473.50 for beef and supplies furnished the troops by Jordan & McPike, and this bill is for the payment of Dorsey and Shepard for the flour, coffee, bacon, and other supplies furnished by them to the same troops and at the same times as those furnished by Jordan & McPike. The claims of Dorsey and Shepard appear to be just and proper, and ought, in justice, to have been paid years ago.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. LORE. I move that this bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

O. L. COCHRAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1566) for the relief of O. L. Cochran, late postmaster at Houston, Tex., reimbursing him for money erroneously collected from him by the Post-Office Department.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to O. L. Cochran, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $422.85, collected from him by the Post-Office Department on the 26th day of November, A. D. 1867, and which amount is in excess of what he was indebted to said Department.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HOLMAN. The report in this case, I believe, is short?

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest it had better be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report:

This claim is based upon the following facts: O. L. Cochran was postmaster at Houston, Tex., in the year 1861. His account with the Government was settled in 1867, when he was found indebted to the United States in the sum of $568.71, which he paid under protest that he was not indebted.

In this settlement he did not receive any compensation for his services as postmaster at Houston for the months of April and May, 1861, for the reason that if his returns had been rendered they were never received by the Auditor's office or by the Post-Office Department for the months named.

Subsequent to this payment under protest Cochran submitted a duplicate return as postmaster for the months of April and May, 1861, which would have reduced his indebtedness in the settlement made in 1867 from $568.71 to $145.86, showing an overpayment made by him of $422.85, which is now justly due him.

All this is certified by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the bill.

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1884.

SIR: In answer to your inquiry for the facts in the case of Owen L. Cochran, who was postmaster at Houston, Tex., I have the honor to submit the following statement:

A settlement was made in this office of Mr. Cochran's account in the year 1867, when he was found indebted to the United States in the sum of $568.71, which he paid under protest that he was not indebted.

In the above settlement Mr. Cochran did not receive any compensation for his services as postmaster at Houston for the months of April and May, 1861, for the reason that if the returns had been rendered they were never received by the Auditor's office or by the Post-Office Department for the months named.

Subsequent to this payment under protest Mr. Cochran submitted a duplicate return as postmaster for the months of April and May, 1861, which would have reduced his indebtedness in the settlement made in 1867 from $568.71 to $145.86, showing an overpayment made by him of $422.85, and the sum of $422.85 is justly due to Mr. Cochran.

Respectfully,

J. H. ELA, Auditor.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART,
House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

ALEXANDER D. SCHENCK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1266) for the relief of Alexander D. Schenck.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Alexander D. Schenck, a first lieutenant in the Second Artillery, the sum of $107.65, being the amount he has been required to deposit with the Treasurer of the United States to make good the loss of certain subsistence stores pertaining to the Commissary Department of the United States Army, and for which he was responsible, as acting commissary of subsistence at Fort Johnston, North Carolina, in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; said stores having been stolen or otherwise unlawfully disposed of by John V. Seyton, late a commissary-sergeant in the United States Army, without the knowledge, consent, fault, or neglect of said Schenck.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

YOST HARBAUGH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4681) for the relief of Yost Harbaugh.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Yost Harbaugh the sum of $70, for his services as messenger in the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury from October 10 to November 10, 1876.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM W. THOMAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 691) for the relief of William W. Thomas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to pay to William W. Thomas, of Portland, in the State of Maine, the sum of $309 (being the amount of coupons of United States bonds lost by him, and now unpaid, namely: Coupons due December 15, 1867, of five-hundred-dollar seven-thirty notes numbered 132909, 132911, 142262, 142268, act of June 30, 1864, dated June 15, 1865; also coupons due January 15, 1868, of one-thousand-dollar seven-thirty notes numbered 24199, 24204, 39406, and 64136, act of June 30, 1864, dated July 15, 1865; and coupons due January 1, 1868, of bonds numbered 1437, 86826, and 88827, for $1,000 each, act of July 17, 1861), upon said Thomas giving a bond of indemnity in double the amount to be paid, with sureties satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report in this case be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ELLWOOD, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report:

Mr. W. W. Thomas was the owner of coupons of United States bonds of the value of $309. They were due, as stated in the bill, in December, 1867, and January, 1868. In some way Mr. Thomas lost the coupons after they were severed from the bonds. The Treasury Department reports that the coupons in question have never been presented for payment. While the law allows the Department to replace lost bonds, it does not allow it to replace lost coupons.

The bill provides that Mr. Thomas shall protect the Treasury by giving a bond in double the amount to repay the sum in the improbable event of any future presentation of the coupons.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill as amended, striking out "$450" and inserting "$309."

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the amendment be adopted.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

A. J. GUTHRIE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2154) for the relief of the legal representatives of A. J. Guthrie, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the legal representatives of A. J. Guthrie, deceased, of Louisville, Ky., out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $302.20, being for services rendered and money advanced in taking care of property of the United States.

The report (by Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania) was read, as follows:

That said Guthrie was made custodian of certain property seized by the Government, and had possession thereof from January 16 to April 20, 1867, at the agreed price of $2.50 per day. Upon the last-named day the movable property (consisting of whisky) was shipped from Carrollton, Ky., to Louisville, Ky., but Mr. Guthrie, under orders of the collector, continued in charge of the distillery, at the rate of $2 per day, from April 21 to July 9, 1867. That Mr. Guthrie filed separate bills for his service, &c., both of which were approved. The first bill was:

For 95 days' time, from January 16 to April 20, at $2.50	$237 50
For 22 whisky-barrels furnished by him, at a price agreed upon, to wit, $2.75	60 50
Drayage and labor paid by him	4 20
Aggregating the sum of	302 20

The second bill being for the time while in charge of the distillery after the removal of the whisky, being eighty days, at $2 per day, from April 2 to July 9, amounting to $160.

The amount first mentioned was mislaid or lost, and the second bill was paid, as part of the costs in the case.

After finding that this first account had not been allowed by the court Mr. Guthrie placed the claim in the hands of a claim agent, as appears from affidavits filed, who soon died, leaving the claim uncollected.

The evidence of the collector, James Hudnall, United States Marshal W. A. Merriwether, and others, fully set forth the above facts, and your committee, therefore, report back the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

On motion of Mr. McMILLIN, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN F. SEVERANCE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2268) for the relief of John F. Severance.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $85, to be placed to the credit of the Post-Office Department; and the proper accounting officers of the Post-Office Department are hereby directed to credit John F. Severance, of Shelburne, Mass., in his account as postmaster with the same, it being for loss by robbery of his post-office on the night of the 19th day of June, 1878, but without fault or neglect on the part of said postmaster.

The report (by Mr. VAN ALSTYNE) was read, as follows:

The files of the House of Representatives show that this claim was investigated and reported favorably by the Committee on Claims of the Forty-sixth Congress (Report No. 913) and also by the Committee on Claims of the Forty-seventh Congress (Report No. 158). The report first mentioned embodied a statement of facts relied upon, which was adopted by the last-named committee, and was as follows:

"This is a claim for relief by the said Severance, as postmaster at Shelburne Falls, in Franklin County, in the State of Massachusetts, from loss occasioned by the robbery of his office on the night of June 19, 1878. The claimant was appointed as postmaster at Shelburne Falls, and entered upon the duties of his office March 1, 1878. On the night of June 19, between 12 and 3 o'clock, burglars forced open the windows of the office, blew open the safe with gunpowder, and carried away all the stamps therein, of the aggregate value of $435, and all the money therein, of the value of $100, which money had been received from the sale of stamps and postal cards and from postage. At the same time the burglars broke open the jewelry store of J. G. Brown, in the next building to the post-office, and blew open the safe therein, and rifled it of jewelry and $375 in money, the loss of said Brown amounting in all to from $2,000 to $2,500. Early the next morning it was discovered that the post-office and jewelry store had been robbed. The post-office was separated by a partition from the express office, and the outer door of the express office and the partition door between that and the post-office had been forced open. The safe door was badly torn by powder and the inside door blown off. It was a fire-proof safe of the usual construction, and made by E. R. Morse, a manufacturer of good reputation. Pursuit was immediately made of the burglars. The same evening the said Brown and Mr. Bartlett overtook a man eight miles from the said village with a valise, and on asking to see it he emptied two revolvers at his pursuers, hitting Mr. Bartlett, and then ran into the woods. They followed his trail, but lost it. The next night the bridges over which he might escape were guarded and a similar man was seen on the railroad bridge near by. The patrol opened fire with revolvers, which the man returned. They fired away all their cartridges, but the man escaped into the woods. The next morning a man who lived near by found on the spot where this affray had occurred blood on the timbers and a bundle dropped on the abutments of the bridge. It contained the jewelry of the said Brown and specie belonging to him, and a package with $13 in silver change and all the postage-stamps which the postmaster had lost. Some weeks after, an old valise was found near the supposed trail of the burglars with $2 in pennies.

"The postmaster's account of his loss is, then, as follows:

Stamps stolen from the office		$435 00
Money stolen from the office		100 00
Total		535 00
Recovered:
Silver	$13 00
Pennies	2 00
Stamps	435 00
Making the balance lost by the postmaster		85 00

"Full affidavits of all the facts were represented to the committee by the claimant and by other reputable citizens who are acquainted with the circumstances of the case, and some of whom joined in the hunt for the burglars.

"A report in the said case was made by the special agent of the Post-Office Department to said Department, which report is as follows:

"'BOSTON, March 5, 1879.

"'SIR: I have the honor to return ordinary case No. 11381, and to inform you that after investigation I found that the office was entered by burglars on the night of June 18, 1878; that $435 worth of stamps and $100 of postal money was stolen; and that the day following there was found all of the stamps and $13 of the money by the roadside, leaving a loss of $87 to the postmaster.

"'Up to this time no trace of the depredators has been found, although the town officers have been on the constant hunt and have offered a reward of $250 for their apprehension.

"'Very respectfully,

"'CHARLES FIELD,
"'Special Agent Post-Office Department.

"'DAVID B. PARKER,
"'Chief Special Agent Post-Office Department, Washington, D. C.'

"The testimony satisfies the committee beyond a doubt that the claimant and the officials connected with the office have always borne the highest character, and that they used due diligence in the care of the property intrusted to their charge. They did all that any man could reasonably have been expected to do in order to secure the property in the post-office. It is also evident from the circumstances, as reported, that everything was done that was possible to secure the burglars and the property which they had stolen, and it was owing to the diligence and perseverance of the pursuers that so large a portion of the stolen property was recovered, and the loss of the postmaster was reduced from the sum of $535 to the sum of $85. The committee believe that the claimant ought to be relieved of the loss, and therefore report back the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage."

Your committee find, from the testimony submitted, that the statement of facts in said report is true and correct, adopt the same as their own, concur in the conclusions therein expressed, and report the said bill back, and recommend that the same do pass.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to know why recovery could not be obtained under the general law.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If I understand it, the general law does not allow a recovery for money lost.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is correct.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But only for stamps.

Now, the inquiry I desire to make of the chairman of the committee is this: Why is it when we come to legislate in general statutes we prohibit allowances covering money lost and then proceed to make them by special legislation?

Mr. McMILLIN. I know of no reason for it. I see no reason why in one case it can not be recovered as well as in any other. It was an inadvertence, perhaps, on the part of those framing the general law in leaving out this special class of claims.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. No; for a reason was given by the committee why a general law was not drawn covering the loss of money. It was because it was not always possible to distinguish money which had been accumulated in due course of trade, and money which properly belonged to the Post-Office Department, and received in exchange for stamps.

Mr. McMILLIN. That difficulty, I think the gentleman will observe from the report here in this case, has been removed.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It was the policy of the Congress, then, not to allow recovery for money lost in any instance. I did not see any propriety in that legislation then, but we ought to pursue a general course in reference to these matters. A general law will be of little consequence if we are required in every case to pass a special act.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman will remember the difficulty of getting to any private bill he must admit the general law is not entirely inoperative. It was the opinion of the committee that this officer had exercised all due diligence in the custody of these funds. The safe which had been provided for the funds of the postal department was as secure as that in which he kept his own money. His personal funds and those of the Post-Office Department were kept separate, in order that there might be no confusion between the two accounts. I make this statement only to show that the character of the safe in which the public funds were kept proved that this officer had exercised due diligence, that diligence which any business man would exercise over his own funds.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will not understand me as objecting to the passage of this bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. No; I do not.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The reason why I mentioned it is this: At the time the general law was passed a bill was pending for the relief of the postmaster in my city who had lost money under circumstances similar to those in this case. His office was entered in the night-time and his safe blown open by gunpowder. He lost stamps, and also money which he had received in exchange for stamps. He pursued the burglar and captured him at very considerable expense, securing the return of most of the postage-stamps which had been stolen, but no part of the money. He was compelled under the general law after it had been passed to withdraw his claim, going to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, where he recovered simply for the residue of the stamps not secured at the time of the capture of the burglar and lost every penny of the money which had been stolen. Now, I do not understand why there should be fish of one and flesh of another.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does the gentleman think this presents a meritorious case? If so, I suggest that failure of justice in a former case does not excuse us from failing to do justice in this.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the United States Government does not want its faithful officers to lose money in the discharge of their duties where everything has been done that can reasonably be required of a functionary to protect the trusts confided to his charge. Now, sir, from the very foundation of the Government down to the present hour just such claims as the one we are considering have been paid almost without question when they were brought to the attention of this body, each claim standing upon its individual merits and upon the facts as developed. I am surprised that the gentleman from Indiana should object to the passage of this bill. Surely he is not in favor of making a public official work for nothing and pay for the privilege of doing it.

Congress, when it framed a general law for making good all losses by postmasters, where the loss occurred without fault of their own, in omitting to provide for the reimbursement of money losses, did not intend to deny all relief.

If such had been the case it would force postmasters not only to take extraordinary precautions in the care of public property, but would compel them to run extraordinary risks; in fact, to run greater risks than any other class of officers under the Government.

In excluding money losses from adjustment at the Post-Office Department the purpose was to prevent either fraud or collusion by postmasters or Department officials. A second reason for forcing postmasters to come to Congress for recovery of money losses was to compel scrutiny of all the facts and require the claimant to show that he had exercised due diligence and done his whole duty.

I submit, sir, that this is a meritorious claim. The case has been thoroughly inquired into and unanimously reported by the committee, and it ought to be passed by this House as hundreds of similar claims have been passed in the history of the Government.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state again that I have not objected to the passage of this bill. I believe it ought to pass. The reason I referred to the matter at all was in order to bring to the attention of Congress some recollection of the character of legislation in which we sometimes indulge. I assert that at the time the general law was passed the question of excluding from its operation money losses by postmasters was to prevent frauds against the Government. It was the policy of Congress at that time to prohibit the allowance of money losses. That reason for adopting such a policy was then clearly stated, and the provision seemed to have been adopted almost unanimously. I refer to it, as I stated a moment ago, because it applies directly to a case affecting one of my immediate constituents.

It is true he may now come into the Congress, perhaps, and secure a favorable report on a bill allowing him all the balance of his loss; but every man of experience in legislative matters knows that he would rather put his hand in his pocket and reimburse a constituent out of his own funds to the extent of a hundred or two dollars than to attempt to take upon himself the burden of the passage of a special bill for his relief through Congress, where every Representative is peculiarly the guardian of the national Treasury, and where, under our peculiar system of rules, any captious gentleman, by the interposition of a single objection, may prevent the doing of justice to a private citizen. The manner in which we reach the consideration of these private claims would be disreputable if indulged in by any other body of less prominence than the American Congress. If we were to treat our neighbors in our dealings with them as citizens as the Government treats those to whom it becomes indebted, it is doubtful whether one of us, after a year or two, would be able to secure credit for a pound of soap at a corner grocery. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF CERTAIN OFFICERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4688) to pay certain officers of the Army for services actually rendered during the late war.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, this bill is a general bill in its nature. There has been already a similar bill passed by the House, as I am informed by the Chairman of the Committee on War Claims. I therefore move that this bill be reported back to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

CITIZENS OF MARION COUNTY, TENNESSEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4684) for the relief of certain citizens of Marion County, Tennessee, reported by Mr. GEDDES from the Committee on War Claims.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claims of certain citizens of Marion County, Tennessee, for quartermaster's stores and commissary supplies alleged to have been taken from them by United States troops during the late war, and known as claims filed before the "Jasper board," so called, be, and they are hereby, referred the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army, who shall have full jurisdiction to examine and consider said claims, and make report thereon to Congress as in cases provided for in the second and third sections of the act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, &c., approved July 4, 1864.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

ELIZABETH CARSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 12) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated do pay to Elizabeth Carson, of Bourbon County, Kentucky, the sum of $2,630.50, in full satisfaction for subsistence, use of jail, fuel, fire, care and attention furnished by her to conscripts, deserters, and rebel prisoners confined in the jail of Bourbon County, Kentucky, by the military authorities of the United States in the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865.

The report (by Mr. GEDDES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 12) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson, submit the following report:

It is alleged that in the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865 the petitioner furnished subsistence, fuel, fires, &c., to conscripts, deserters, and rebel prisoners confined in the jail of Bourbon County, Kentucky, by order of the military authorities of the United States. Claim stated at $4,618.70.

The claimant made no complaint to the War Department, and the very statement of her case is vague and uncertain, and the proof submitted would not warrant the committee in passing it.

It seems to your committee that an investigation by the Secretary of War, or under his direction, is a matter of necessity before intelligent action can be had upon this case.

The committee therefore report herewith an amendment, in the nature of a substitute for Senate bill, conferring power upon the Secretary of War to have the case investigated through the Quartermaster's Department, and to report the result, with his recommendation thereon, to Congress for its action in the premises.

Mr. GEDDES. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that the substitute has not been sent to the desk.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Do I understand that there is no substitute accompanying the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no substitute on file at the desk.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] the propriety, in the absence of the substitute, of passing over this bill informally.

Mr. GEDDES. I think the substitute will be found in the papers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has sent to the file-room to ascertain if a substitute be pending or not.

Mr. GEDDES. I ask that for the present the case be passed over informally.

There was no objection.

NICHOLAS J. BIGLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1347) for the relief of Capt. Nicholas J. Bigley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of —— dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of the funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay Capt. Nicholas J. Bigley for the value of the steamer Hercules and tow of coal, destroyed at Memphis, Tenn., in the month of February, 1863.

The report (by Mr. GEDDES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1347) for the relief of Capt. Nicholas S. Bigley, submit the following report:

The claimant in this case asks compensation for the alleged price and value of the following property destroyed during the late war: Four barge-loads of coal, aggregating 70,638 bushels, at 30 cents per bushel, $21,211.40; the value of the steam towboat Hercules, $25,000; total, $46,211.40.

This case is somewhat exceptional in not exciting much doubt or uncertainty as to the facts of the case. The evidence is very full, but not materially conflicting. The claimant has presented his case supported in all its important points by the most satisfactory testimony. The questions to be decided are therefore less difficult.

1. The loyalty of the claimant is clearly established.

2. His ownership of the property when destroyed and of the claim at this time can not be questioned.

3. The value of the property and the extent of the claimant's loss at the time it occurred must be conceded.

4. The remaining question is, whether, admitting the facts claimed, the Government is under any legal or equitable obligation to remunerate him for the loss.

A very brief review of the facts will be necessary in order to present the questions on which the right to compensation depends.

In the month of January, 1863, the United States military authorities occupied Memphis, Tenn., and, being in need of supplies for the Army, offered extraordinary inducements to parties who were willing to engage in such hazardous enterprises. At that time the quartermaster of the Army at that city sent the following order by telegraph:

DEPARTMENT QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE,
Memphis, January 24, 1863.

E. R. BLASDEL, Esq.:

Furnish to this department 75,000 to 100,000 bushels of Youghiogheny coal; also 2,000 tons of hay, for which a good market price will be paid; coal at 30 cents per bushel, and hay at $27.50 per ton.

A. R. EDDY.
Per DAN. W. SENBE,
Chief Clerk.

This order by telegraph addressed to Mr. Blasdel was received by him. He at the time resided at Lawrenceburg, Ind., a point on the Ohio River 130 miles above the city of Louisville, and he was at the time engaged in the produce business.

The claimant then resided in Pittsburgh, Pa. It does not appear, nor is it material, where Mr. Blasdel met claimant and delivered to him the telegraphic order.

There is no evidence tending to show that either Mr. Blasdel or claimant answered the telegram accepting the proposition made in it,

The military authorities at Memphis had no notice that this particular order would be complied with. Claimant appears to have relied on the well-known necessities of Government for such supplies at that time and place, or felt unwilling to incur the absolute obligation to deliver under the circumstances. The proof is clear that he fully realized the risks involved in the undertaking. He had before frequently undertaken such ventures that proved successful and profitable. He was engaged in a business of the most hazardous character, and voluntarily assumed the responsibility. He entered upon the performance of it without notice that he would perform it, and without demanding protection. Tempted doubtless by the prices offered and the profits of a successful voyage, he engaged in it.

The evidence clearly establishes the fact that claimant started on the expedition with about 100,000 bushels of coal of the description designated in the order mentioned, which was carried in six coal-boats towed by the steamer Hercules, Capt. Thomas McCloskey being in command. The claimant accompanied the expedition in person. They started down the river early in the month of February, 1863. They met with no serious obstacles until Memphis was reached. Claimant, in his affidavit in reference to the trip, among other things, says:

"That he hastened to Memphis with the towboat Hercules and seven full boats, containing about 100,000 bushels of coal, knowing the Government was much in need of coal at that time; that fearing an attack from guerrillas, he made an application to the commanding officer at Cairo for a convoy, which was refused, and he was assured by that officer that there was no danger."

He then proceeded to Memphis, and makes the following statement in his affidavit as to the condition of things found to exist there and the reason for not landing at Memphis:

"That said steamer arrived off Memphis, Tenn., at 8 o'clock and 30 minutes on the morning of 18th of February, 1863. There was a heavy, dense fog prevailing at the time the steamer arrived at said point; the fog was so heavy and dense we could not see the Memphis shore. Owing to the circumstances by which we were surrounded at the time it was, after consultation together, deemed imprudent and unsafe by the captain and pilots of the vessel to attempt to land the vessel and tow at the Memphis wharf for fear of sinking some of the vessels and craft lying at and alongside that wharf."

Captain McCloskey, of the tugboat, in his affidavit, states the circumstances at Memphis on their arrival there:

"That when landing at Memphis, and just above the city, a heavy fog set in, and the current being strong and the wharf somewhat crowded with other craft, the officers of the boat deemed it unsafe just then to attempt a landing at the city wharf, and landed temporarily on the Arkansas side, nearly opposite the city. Soon after the steamer was attacked by a guerrilla band and taken possession of, burned, and destroyed."

One of the crew was killed; claimant, captain, and the rest taken prisoners.

The next day they were released and returned to the landing about 1 o'clock, and found six of the coal-boats still afloat. They procured another towboat and succeeded in delivering three of the coal-barges, but that night the remaining three coal-barges were destroyed. The Government paid for the coal delivered at the price designated in the order mentioned. It is clearly established by the evidence in this case that no Government officer knew when this party would arrive with their supplies. No effort was made to advise the military authorities at Memphis of the approach of this party with coal. No one, on behalf of the Government, was consulted as to the propriety of landing, temporarily, on the Arkansas side of the river. The place where they landed was not considered by claimant as the place of delivery, but only a temporary landing until a more convenient time.

It is insisted on behalf of claimant that his acts constituted a delivery, and the affidavits of several rivermen engaged in the trade at that time have been submitted. They do not strengthen the claimant's case. One of them, Holmes Harger, says:

"As a riverman, knowing the usages and customs of the trade, I would say that if this coal in tow of the steamer Hercules had been sunk or lost in transit by reason of the dangers of navigation in storms, striking on a bar in the river or a snag, or striking against the shore, or by other incidents of navigation, then in that case the loss would undoubtedly have been Mr. Bigley's."

Here certainly there was no delivery, or what should in law be considered equivalent to delivery. The order was dated at Memphis. The military authorities were stationed at Memphis. Claimant regarded Memphis as the place of delivery, and would have landed there for that purpose if the obstacles mentioned had not intervened. The Government was evidently prepared to, and ready to, receive the coal at the time, for when notified of the landing of the three barges of coal at Memphis the quartermaster received the same and paid for it.

Thus was there no delivery of this property to the Government. It was destroyed when in the possession and under the exclusive control of the claimant. He followed his own judgment and the judgment of his men as to the safety of the course adopted.

In the absence of any legal liability of the Government, your committee do not consider the facts as warranting any such generosity. The loss was heavy, it is true. It was a great misfortune. But losses, hardships, and misfortunes occur in peace and in war. The loss of life and limb, health and property, and other innumerable sacrifices entailed by the war can not be compensated for in money. Many of such losses and sacrifices resulted from pure patriotism, without hope of pecuniary reward, and the sufferers come to Congress asking for relief. Such cases often appeal with great force to our sympathy.

But this case is not of that character. There is no equitable consideration calling upon the Government to make compensation. It is a case of a contractor seeking to make money during the war. He was availing himself of the opportunities afforded by the necessities of the Government. He was influenced by the high prices paid for such services. It was fortunate for the Government that men of capital were found ready to risk their property in such hazardous enterprises. If he had been continuously successful throughout the war, and a great fortune had been accumulated by him, he would hardly appreciate the force of an argument that he was under a moral and equitable obligation to the Government to contribute liberally of his gain to relieve the country of the burden imposed by the war. He would doubtless then feel that he took his chances, made money, and, as it was a matter of fair contract in open market, he should be allowed to keep and enjoy his profits.

This claim has in years past been fully considered by the Government and payment refused. In a report of the War Department in 1870 the following statement appears:

"Reports adverse to the allowance of this claim have been made by the Quartermaster-General, the Judge-Advocate-General, and the Third Auditor, the latter report being concurred in by the Second Comptroller. The ground of the rejection is that the property was not delivered to the Government, but was destroyed while it was in the ownership and possession of the claimant."

Adverse report was also submitted by the Committee on War Claims to the Forty-eighth Congress.

In view of all the facts of this case and the considerations bearing upon it your committee feel called upon to report adversely to the allowance of the claim, and therefore recommend that it lie upon the table, and that the report be printed.

Mr. ROWELL. I call for the reading of the minority report.

The views of the minority were read, as follows:

This claim was before the last Congress, and was favorably reported from the Senate Committee on Claims for the value of the coal destroyed, $21,211.40, and the bill, as thus reported, passed the Senate. A similar bill was reported favorably from the House Committee on War Claims, but for want of time failed of consideration.

In reporting this claim to the last Congress the two committees stated the facts to be as follows:

"It appears from the evidence in this case that in the winter of 1862 and 1863 about 45,000 troops were stationed at Memphis, Tenn., under the command of General Hurlbut, and that there was a great scarcity of and demand for coal, with which to move the immense quantities of supply stores that were required to supply the Army of the Tennessee, and in order to supply this demand Capt. A. R. Eddy, post-quartermaster at Memphis, sent the following telegram to one E. S. Blasdel:

DEPOT QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE,
Memphis, January 24, 1863.

E. S. BLASDEL, Esq.:

Furnish to this depot from (75,000) seventy-five thousand to one hundred thousand (100,000) bushels of Youghiogheny coal; also (2,000) two thousand tons of hay, for which a good market price will be paid.

Coal at 30 cents per bushel.

Hay at 27½ dollars per ton.

A. R. EDDY,
Per DAN. W. SENBE, Chief Clerk.

Upon the receipt of this telegram Mr. Blasdel immediately transferred the order to the claimant, N. J. Bigley, who was then furnishing large quantities of Youghiogheny coal to the Government at other points, who accepted the order and at once undertook to fill it. He had seven barges gauged by the proper officers, and forwarded his certificates to the post-quartermaster at Memphis, and notified him that he was en route with the coal, the seven barges being towed by the towboat Hercules to Memphis, reaching that point on the morning of February 17, 1863.

On reaching Memphis claimant notified General McPherson, then in command, that he had delivered the coal as per contract, but owing to the crowded condition of the wharves he was directed to land his towboat and barges on the opposite (Arkansas) shore, which order he obeyed. Claimant states that he was advised that a guard was detailed to protect the boat and coal, but they never reported for duty. Soon after the boat landed it was attacked by the guerrillas and burned, and four of the barges and their contents were sunk. The other three were paid for by the depot quartermaster at the contract price and according to the certificate of the gaugers which had been previously forwarded to him. Claimant presented his bill to the depot quartermaster for the other four barges and contents and for the value of his towboat, which had been destroyed by the neglect of the agents of the Government, but payment was refused because of a want of jurisdiction of the depot quartermaster over such claims. The claim was afterward presented to the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army for allowance and payment, and was by him rejected for the same reason, but was by him recommended to the favorable consideration and action of Congress.

Claimant now comes to Congress and asks compensation for the coal contained in the four barges that were sunk, at the contract price, and for the amounts as shown by the gauger's certificates, and for the loss of the towboat Hercules, at a price fully shown by the testimony to have been a fair and reasonable valuation. The items may be more definitely expressed as follows:

70,638 bushels of coal, at 30 cents	$21,211 40
Value of towboat Hercules	25,000 00

The evidence shows conclusively that the claimant was acting under the direct and positive orders of the agent of the Government, and that the loss of the property above mentioned was in no way chargeable to his neglect or carlessness; that the claimant had always been loyal to the Government, and had given liberally of his own private means to aid the Government in its days of sore trial and dire necessity. This claim has been considered by the Quartermaster-General, the Judge-Advocate-General, the Third Auditor, and the Second Comptroller, respectively, and by them rejected for the reason that the property "was destroyed while it was in the possession of the claimant." Your committee can not see that this should be a bar to the claimant's right to recovery, as he was acting under the special and positive orders of the Government through its recognized agents. This opinion seems to have been shown by Quartermaster-General Meigs, who, in the conclusion of his decision rejecting the claim, under date of May 11, 1869, uses these words:

"Congress alone, it seems to me, can give relief. The loss was a heavy one, and the circumstances are such as, I think, should commend the case to the favorable consideration of Congress."

In reviewing the report of the Quartermaster-General on this case the Inspector-General, Hardie, uses these words:

"The views of the Quartermaster-General are concurred in by the undersigned. The loss was heavy and the circumstances such as entitle the claimant to such favorable consideration as can legally be granted."

Judge-Advocate-General W. M. Dunn concludes his final review of the entire case, under date November 22, 1870, with these words:

"I concur in the conclusions of the reports rejecting this claim, and also in the foregoing recommendations thereof to the favorable consideration of Congress."

There is every reason to believe that while these departmental officials could not legally allow the said claim, yet they fully recognized and candidly acknowledged its justice.

Your committee are of opinion that the claimant is entitled to the relief he seeks to the extent of the value of the coal.

Your committee are of opinion that claimant should not receive payment from the Government for the towboat Hercules, by which said coal was transported, for the reason that it was a loss incident to natural risks which he assumed in delivering the coal, and for the further reason that the boat formed no part of the goods contracted for by the Government to be delivered; but your committee are clearly of opinion that claimant is entitled to recover the value of the coal destroyed, at the contract price of 30 cents per bushel, amounting to $21,211.40, and accordingly report back said bill with this amendment, and recommend its passage.

In the Forty-seventh Congress three members of the House Committee on War Claims dissented from the report of the majority upon the ground that the coal was not delivered at the wharf at Memphis, and hence could not be held to be such a delivery as was contemplated in the order for the furnishing of the coal, and that therefore the Government was not liable for the loss.

The claimant has filed additional testimony in this Congress, in which at least eight old river men testify that they are acquainted with the coal trade and the customs governing the delivery of coal at the various landings on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers at the time this loss was sustained, and they unanimously agree that the delivery of the coal by Captain Bigley at the point opposite the city of Memphis was a good and sufficient delivery under his contract, and that the Government did accept such deliveries as deliveries at the "Memphis depot," and that it was not customary to deliver coal at the usual wharfs, but at some convenient landing within a reasonable distance of the point where it is to be received.

The testimony all goes to show conclusively that Captain Bigley made a reasonable compliance with the contract, and that the loss is in no way chargeable to his negligence, and the officers and agents of the Government at Memphis so understood it at the time. As an evidence of this fact, they received and paid for the three barges of coal that were spared by the rebels, and received it at the landing opposite Memphis, where the entire cargo was delivered, thereby admitting that the delivery of the coal was good and sufficient under the contract.

We are of the opinion that Captain Bigley ought to recover the amount of the loss he sustained. As the claim for the recovery of the value of the steamer Hercules rests upon an entirely different basis to that for the recovery of the value of the coal delivered and destroyed, we recommend that he be paid for the 70,638 bushels of coal at 30 cents per bushel, amounting to the sum of $21,211.40, and herewith report a bill for that amount as a substitute for H. R. 1347, and recommend that it do pass. The substitute is identical with the bill that passed the Senate in the Forty-seventh Congress and to the bill now pending in that branch of Congress.

A bill for the relief of Nicholas J. Bigley.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Nicholas J. Bigley the sum of $21,211.40 for 70,638 bushels of coal lost at Memphis, Tenn., in the month of February, 1863.

Mr. GEDDES. I move that the bill and substitute submitted be reported to the House with the recommendation that they do lie upon the table.

Mr. ROWELL. I move to amend that motion so that the substitute reported by the minority of the committee shall be reported back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL]. The question is, Shall the substitute be adopted?

Mr. STORM. I suppose the question is debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee informally rose, and Mr. NICHOLLS took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon; and

A bill (H. R. 4088) to incorporate the Luther Statue Association to erect and maintain a monument or statue in memory of Martin Luther in the District of Columbia.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 2379) to authorize the transfer of one of the vessels of the Greely relief expedition to the Treasury Department for a revenue-cutter, and the retention of the other two for use in the Navy; and

A bill (S. 2449) to provide for the distribution of the Statutes of the United States and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to designated incorporated bodies, institutions, and associations, within the several States and Territories.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

NICHOLAS J. BIGLEY.

Mr. STORM. I desire to be heard upon this case. I was one of the Committee on War Claims who signed the minority report, and I desire to be heard in support of the motion of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL].

There is no dispute in this case about the main facts. The whole controversy is at best about a bald technicality—a simple, sharp, legal question about what constitutes a delivery of property under the contract in this case. The facts are that the applicant in this case, Mr. Bigley, on a telegram received from the military authorities at Memphis to fulfill a large order for coal of which the Government was at that time in pressing need—in pursuance of that order loaded seven barges of coal and with a steamboat of which he was the owner commenced to take this coal down the Ohio River to Memphis, the point of shipment. There is no dispute about the quantity of coal or about the price of the coal. There is no dispute about the fact that three of the barges of coal were delivered to the Government and accepted. There is no dispute about the fact that he delivered the remaining four barges as near the point of delivery as possible, being the amount of coal for which this bill seeks to pay the claimant the sum of about $21,000.

The facts as I recollect them, and as they are set forth in the report, are these: The claimant received this telegram, or some other gentleman received it who delivered it to Mr. Bigley for fulfillment, and he commenced to fulfill the order. He went down the river with this convoy of barges and reached a point opposite Cairo. There was a heavy fog in the river, and some report about the dangers of navigation from the presence of rebels in that neighborhood. At that place Mr. Bigley made application to an officer of the United States Government, asking him to protect his boats while going down the river. He was assured by the officer that everything was all right and there was no necessity for that. He proceeded down the river with his barges of coal, arriving at Memphis; and being informed that the wharf there—the general place of delivery—was so crowded that it was dangerous to land there, he communicated this fact to General McPherson, at that time the officer in command.

Thinking it better, in view of the crowded condition of the wharf, he landed this convoy of coal upon the opposite side of the river—upon the Arkansas shore. While there with these seven barges he was attacked by some guerrillas, who came from the Arkansas side. He was captured and taken some thirteen miles into the country; he was robbed and subjected to very brutal and cruel treatment. One of the crew was killed. Being released the next morning, and returning to his boats, Mr. Bigley discovered that the United States Government had taken three of the boats and landed them on the Memphis side of the river, and for those three boat-loads of coal he received his pay from the Government. The other four boats were destroyed and sunk in the river—became a complete loss.

These are the facts, about which I think there can be no dispute. He landed the coal as near to the place of shipment as the condition of the wharf would allow, and I claim, as a matter of law (and this seems to be the point on which this whole question hangs), that there was a complete, absolute delivery of that property to the Government of the United States. It was a more complete delivery than that which the law says constitutes a good delivery; for, as gentlemen are aware, the mere delivery of the key of a warehouse passes the goods in it. Here was an actual taking of possession by the United States to the extent of three of the seven barges. Further than that, the United States sent a party of men over to protect the remaining barges, which were at that time within range of the guns of a United States war vessel then in those waters. The United States sent a guard there, which for some unexplained reason was subsequently withdrawn. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that upon every principle of law there was a good, valid, legal, actual delivery of this property by Mr. Bigley, the claimant, to the United States, and that the Government accepted it. These facts, I say, can not be disputed.

But there are still further considerations in favor of this claim. This case was favorably considered and reported by the Senate committee in the Forty-seventh Congress, and a bill similar to this passed the Senate. It also received a favorable report in this House from a majority of the Committee on War Claims in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Since that time, Mr. Chairman, there has been additional evidence taken upon the question as to the actual delivery of this property. Some eight or nine old rivermen on that river, having knowledge of the customs concerning the delivery of coal at this very point, Memphis, and other points along the river, testify that according to the customs prevailing on that river and the circumstances in this case the delivery is a good one. Whether or not the Government actually received this coal on the Arkansas shore as a good delivery, we claim that according to the customs prevailing on that river as proved in this case there was an actual delivery of the coal at the place called for.

The telegram requested that the coal be delivered at "the military depot" at Memphis. What was that military depot? Was it simply a wharf three or four squares long, which, as the testimony in this case shows, was already crowded by other vessels, or was it the point nearest that wharf where the coal could be safely landed? It is shown by the facts in this case that the coal was landed as near the wharf as possible. The telegram did not call for the delivery of the coal at the wharf, but at this "military depot," which occupied the whole river at that point.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a fallacy running all the way through the report of the able chairman of the Committee on War Claims [Mr. GEDDES] in this case. I know how hard it is to oppose a report made by that gentleman or by a majority of the committee. I know how hard it always is to overcome an adverse report of the Committee on War Claims, that committee being usually very careful in its reports. Yet there runs through this whole report the remarkable fallacy of assuming—what there is not a single particle of evidence in the whole case to show—that the price offered by the Government for this coal was not the ordinary price for coal at that place, but that Mr. Bigley, the claimant, was, by reason of an extraordinary price, induced to take upon himself these risks or hazards. It is assumed that the war risks and the risks of navigation were voluntarily taken by Mr. Bigley in view of the large price the Government was offering for coal. If you strike out of the report this assumption (which is entirely without foundation in the evidence), there is nothing to support the reasoning of the majority report; and that report stands at best, as I have stated, upon a mere technicality. The price offered by the Government was the ordinary price, as any one acquainted with the price of coal at the time knows.

This man was loyal to his country and its cause in the late war. Apart from his losses in this case he suffered greatly in the loss of his property during the war. He comes here now and asks the Government to pay him for these four barges of coal which he delivered at the nearest point practicable under the circumstances. The Government had taken actual possession of three of the barges and was legally in possession of the others; and the subsequent loss of the four remaining barges must fall upon the Government.

The Quartermaster-General of the Army in passing upon this claim and officers of other Departments have said that while technically they could not allow the claim, it was a proper case for Congressional action. And Congress ought to grant this relief. We are the only tribunal in which such relief can be given; and I believe the sense of fairness and justice prevailing in this House will sustain this minority report.

I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague on the committee [Mr. ROWELL].

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to detain the House with any lengthy statement, but it does seem to me that a fair consideration of the facts and law in this case will induce a unanimous vote in favor of the minority report. The mistake made by the majority of the committee is both a mistake of fact and of law. If this coal was delivered to the United States Government, then it will be admitted that it ought to pay for it. Now, under the facts in this case, I insist upon it a legal delivery was made to the United States. Under the evidence by rivermen, the coal depot at Memphis for barge-loads of coal was anywhere in the neighborhood at coal wharves where the boat could get into shore. With a convoy and a large number of barges they could not be taken into some particular wharf, but there were three or four places in the neighborhood of Memphis where coal was wont to be landed.

When this convoy and these barges reached the neighborhood of Memphis they landed this coal at one of the coal landings and notified one of the Government officers that the coal was there. They were afterward attacked by guerrillas, and the captain, the proprietor, and the crew captured. Subsequent to the capture and before the coal-barges were destroyed the city of Memphis took possession of all these barges and placed a guard over them and continued that guard for some length of time. While the owner was a prisoner, without any orders and in violation of its duty, this guard was withdrawn, and because the guard was withdrawn the enemy's force was subsequently enabled to destroy this coal.

Now, I undertake to say in any court of law a notice of the arrival of coal at the point of destination, at the depot of Memphis, at any coal wharf recognized as a coal depot, subsequently taking possession of that coal by the forces of the United States, was a delivery. The abandonment of the coal by the same forces did not change the fact nor the law that this was an absolute delivery of the coal.

For that reason the Government of the United States owes the money for this coal.

Not speculative prices. That is a mistake. In looking at the evidence it will be ascertained that this man was not selling the Government coal at exorbitant prices. He was selling to the Government coal at the market price. He delivered the coal to the extent proposed by this substitute, and the Government has refused to pay for it. For that reason I joined in the minority report, and I hope this House will have sense of justice enough to see to it that this man is not any longer delayed in the collection of his just debt.

He lost his barges and he lost his steam convoy as well, but this report does not allow him pay for them, because he was not to deliver to the Government a steamboat, nor was he to deliver to the Government barges. It was coal he was to deliver. He took the risk of his own property, and the Government took the risk of the coal after it had been landed at the depot at Memphis, and especially after the Government forces had been put in charge of it.

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Chairman, I feel it is not a pleasant duty or responsibility to resist any claim which makes a strong appeal to one's sympathy, but I have become so accustomed to this class of work, involving one, two, three, or five hundred millions of dollars in amount, claims pending before the War Claims Committee, where we feel uniformly compelled to report on them adversely, that I feel constrained now to resist the approval by the House of this claim. I am gratified in being able to state to any who may listen in regard to it that the facts of the case are not complicated. There is no such conflict as will cause any embarrassment of mind in regard to it. Although in our statements of it here we may not exactly agree in regard to the substance of the case, nevertheless it will be found on comparison of views of gentlemen favoring as well as those opposing the claim that we do not differ materially in regard to the facts.

Now, this claimant was a resident of Pennsylvania, and the claim would naturally arouse greater sympathy on the part of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania than on my part. It is true, the Ohio River is only between us; and finding my own sympathies were aroused, I was put more on my guard in regard to its legal and equitable merits.

This gentleman, being a citizen of Pennsylvania, at the time a man of large means, engaged extensively in river traffic during the war, making large profits, accumulating large gains, becoming immensely wealthy by fortunate ventures of this and other kinds, also took upon himself what will be manifest upon casual investigation as not only a hazardous but profitable enterprise if he won. If he failed in this, he would only lose some of the profits which he had so frequently gained in his early and fortunate adventures during the war.

Gentlemen speak of it as if a contract had been made between the officers of the Government and this claimant, and argue it as though it was simply a question of the delivery of this property.

No contract was made between any officer of the Government and this party at any time from the beginning up to the time of the loss or at any other time.

The facts of the case are briefly these: The telegram, which will be found embodied in the report, upon which this party acted, was not addressed to him at all. It is a telegram addressed to E. S. Blasdel, another man accustomed to ventures of this description, residing at another point in the North.

How this telegram came into the possession of this claimant is not disclosed in the proof; how he was induced to act upon this telegram is not disclosed in the testimony before the committee. But he had the telegram in his possession, and he purchased the coal and undertook to transmit it to the Government without notifying the Government of his intention so to do. Now, observe; the Government gives out a general notice in the form of a telegram to a particular party, and it is the most liberal view that can be taken of it that any man would have the right to act upon that. They sent the telegram to this party that they were in need of certain supplies, and that if delivered they would be paid for upon delivery. That telegram is dated at Memphis, as will be seen by examining it. This party, the claimant in this case, obtained possession in some way of that telegram, and undertook to fill the demand referred to by it. How does he do it?

By telegraphing to any official at Memphis, any Government officer at Memphis, that he stood ready to deliver, or that he would undertake to deliver, or that he desired to perform that contract, or that they might expect him at any particular day, or at any future time? Not at all. He was so unwilling to enter into the contract in the sense of a contract that would bind him as well as the Government had he failed to meet or been unable to perform it, that he gave no information of any intention to do anything in the matter. He did not undertake to accept the proposition of the Government. It was an unaccepted proposition on the part of the officers at Memphis. But he did undertake to do something, and in that effort he met with the disaster upon which this claim is based. He starts down the river with a cargo of coal.

Mr. COSGROVE. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio a question?

Mr. GEDDES. Certainly.

Mr. COSGROVE. To whom was this telegram addressed to which you have referred?

Mr. GEDDES. To E. S. Blasdel.

Mr. COSGROVE. Who is the claimant in this case?

Mr. GEDDES. He is one Nicholas J. Bigley.

Blasdel lived at Lawrenceburg, Ind., a point on the Ohio River, as gentlemen well know. Now, coming to the more important point, and the very essence, I think, of this claim, to which I will invite the closer attention of gentlemen otherwise engaged, we find that in due time this party arrived at Memphis with the coal. No military officer had any knowledge or notice of his approach. He approached and found a dense fog on the Memphis side of the river. He made no application to any military officer to take the judgment of that officer as to what action he should pursue. He consulted no man representing the Government of the United States as to what he should do in reference to the coal. He was accustomed to act on his own judgment. He was there in person, with his own officers in charge of the boats, and declined to consult any military authority of the Government as to what should be done. Finding this dense fog on the river, instead of attempting to deliver the coal at Memphis or consulting any one as to the place of delivery, in the exercise of his own judgment and choice, and to which he was fairly entitled, he shipped over to the opposite shore and there landed. There he met with guerrillas. There the misfortune came. That is what produced his loss. He was captured and some of his crew were captured with him.

Now, subsequent to that time three of those barges with the coal were delivered. How? By whom? By this claimant. He procured another boat and succeeded in delivering to the Government, and that was the first notice that any military officer at Memphis had that any coal was approaching for delivery. This claimant procured a boat and secured the delivery of three of these barges with their contents to the Government of the United States. There is no controversy as to that. The Government promptly paid for the contents of these boats and for the coal thus delivered.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question just there?

Mr. GEDDES. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] stated, as I understood him, that the Government sent guards across to take possession of the seven boats. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that there is no evidence of that fact?

Mr. GEDDES. I do. My claim is—and I will read as bearing upon that point the testimony of one of the officers. Here is the testimony of one that I see before me on first opening this book:

Captain McCloskey and others got the towboat Wisconsin, on the evening of the 18th, to tow over to Memphis three of the coal-boats that the Hercules had charge of. Night coming on, it was deemed unsafe for the Wisconsin to make a second trip same day, and during that night the guerrillas destroyed the remaining four coal-boats with their contents. Three coal-boats were as many as the Wisconsin could tow at once. On reflection one of the coal-boats was sunk at the time of the burning of the Hercules. Only three were carried to Memphis, and further says not.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman permit me one question?

Mr. GEDDES. In a moment. In that same connection I will read the statement of the claimant himself in regard to the circumstances under which he landed on the opposite shore and as to why he did not land on the Memphis side. He says:

That the steamer Hercules with her tow reached Memphis on the morning of the 17th of February, 1863, and was, owing to a fog, and the crowded condition of the wharf at Memphis landing just opposite—temporarily—

"Temporarily." I emphasize that as being significant in law, in fact, and in equity. It shows the judgment of the claimant at that time right at the turning point that he had no right to deliver this coal on the shore opposite to Memphis and that the order contemplated no such thing. It shows that in his judgment he had no right to deliver this coal where he now claims it was delivered in fact and in law; because he says he moved to the opposite bank temporarily on account of the fog on the Memphis shore. And then he adds:

And directly after landing was attacked by guerrillas, and set on fire and destroyed, as detailed in the affidavits of Thomas J. Collins (Exhibit C), Mike Myers (Exhibit D), John Bigley, and Thomas McCloskey (Exhibit E).

Another of the crew says:

Immediately on reaching Memphis, Peter G. Bigley, myself, and others got a towboat, the Wisconsin, and succeeded in towing over three coal-barges, which lay near where the Hercules had been destroyed. Darkness came on, and the captain of the towboat Wisconsin refused to go over again, considering it dangerous.

Mark you, they were acting under the orders of this claimant. They were in his employment.

Mr. HOPKINS. There is the point at which I would like to ask the gentleman the question whether it is not the fact that the steamship Wisconsin was a Government boat, owned by the United States and directed by the officers of the United States Army.

Mr. GEDDES. I am not prepared to answer that question.

Mr. HOPKINS. The testimony shows it.

Mr. GEDDES. I am under the contrary impression. But whether it was or not it was procured at the instance of this party, and the delivery at that boat was not regarded as a delivery to the Government. That night the remaining three coal-barges, he says, were destroyed.

Now, it is said, testimony has been taken tending to show that a delivery on the opposite side was by rivermen regarded as a delivery at Memphis. As I have already said the circumstances of this case clearly show that under this telegram this party did not so regard his duty, but an examination of the testimony of those rivermen, I think, instead of aiding this claimant, materially damages his claim as it stood before that testimony was submitted. As an illustration of that I will read from one of the affidavits a single paragraph as showing to my mind that the evidence does not strengthen his claim. This is the affidavit of Holmes Harger:

As a riverman, knowing the usages and customs of the trade, I would say that if this coal in tow of the steamer Hercules had been sunk or lost in transit by reason of the dangers of navigation in storms, striking on a bar in the river or a snag, or striking against the shore, or by other incidents of navigation, then in that case the loss would undoubtedly have been Mr. Bigley's.

Now, here clearly the loss was the result of one of the incidents of nagivation. Therefore as it strikes my mind there is but one thing that can be said in regard to this claim, and that is as to the equitable considerations on which gentlemen base their support of it. Unpleasant as the duty may be to state it, it seems to me that is a proposition easily answered.

We can not in our legislation at this day, twenty years after the close of the war, undertake to meet all the losses, compensate for all the sacrifices, make whole every man who from a patriotic sense of duty undertook to aid the Government in that hour of danger. And to select out one of this class and override thousands and tens of thousands of other claims, running up into hundreds of millions of dollars, can not secure the approval of my judgment. For of all the men who sustained losses, good though they may be, commendable as their acts were, a man of this class is to my mind the least deserving, and should be deferred until many others are compensated at the hands of a liberal Government.

No man appreciates more highly than I do the value of the services of men of wealth who stepped to the front and tendered of their means and capital during the war. But where a man goes in to make profit—not to turn over his property expecting nothing back, but always expending in the hope of greater returns—when this class of men appeal to me for sympathy, I will not say to them, what may seem harsh and unreasonable, that they are undeserving; I only say that they belong to a class whose claims can not now be met at the hands of this Government.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will allow me a moment——

Mr. GEDDES. With pleasure.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that the point in this case is, whether the Government officers with a Government vessel were undertaking to take the barges across the river. On this point I think the gentleman now on the floor failed to answer the question proposed by my friend from Missouri.

Mr. GEDDES. I have before me one item of proof on that very point; and I say, on a careful investigation of all the proof in the case, it will be found that the Government assumed no responsibility as to the delivery of this property, did not undertake to accept the property. Upon this point I read from the evidence:

This affiant called upon Captain Lewis, assistant-quartermaster of transportation, for a guard to protect the three boats then remaining on the Arkansas shore—

After the others had been delivered—and upon his order the provost-marshal detailed a guard of thirty men, commanded by an officer, for that purpose—

Now, mark you—

The guard so detailed went to the river to be crossed over, and while they were there they were recalled by the order of some officer—for what reason the affiant does not know.

Thus it appears that these three remaining boats had been placed by the claimant, on his own judgment, voluntarily, at this place as a temporary resort until they could be delivered on the other side. His own boat having been destroyed as the result of his own folly, or of the condition of things then surrounding him, there could be nothing more natural than that on his appeal the Government should afford such assistance as was within its reach.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Then there was a guard sent to take charge of the boats?

Mr. GEDDES. No, sir.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. GEDDES. A guard started but was recalled.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Recalled by whom?

Mr. GEDDES. That does not appear; the presumption is that the guard was recalled by the same authority that sent it.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. And that was the Government?

Mr. GEDDES. I presume by the authorities there on that side.

Mr. FINDLAY. How far had the guard proceeded before being recalled?

Mr. GEDDES. To the river.

Mr. FINDLAY. Did they get on the other side?

Mr. GEDDES. No, sir; here is the plain statement:

The guard so detailed went to the river to be crossed over, and while there they were recalled.

Mr. FINDLAY. Were they recalled after they had crossed the river or before?

Mr. GEDDES. Before—as they approached the river. Now, I do not desire to detain the committee further——

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask a question touching the guard?

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Chairman, what time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. GEDDES. Very well; then I will yield any portion of that time which the gentleman from Indiana may desire.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not care to occupy the time of the gentleman unnecessarily, but have merely risen for the purpose of asking him a question. The question I wish to ask is this: Whether or not any further attempt was made to protect this property by the Government than it was exercising all over the country to protect all other property from being destroyed; whether it was doing more than it was everywhere else to protect as far as it could property from being destroyed by the forces of the enemy? It does not appear on the face of the papers, although it has been a great many years since I looked over them; it does not appear on the face of the papers, so far as I remember them, when that consideration was presented to the Third Auditor or some other officer connected with the Treasury Department, that the Government was not making the same effort to protect this property that it was to protect all other property, not because it was the property of the United States or because it had been accepted by the United States, to protect it as it was the purpose and duty of the Government to protect the property everywhere.

Mr. GEDDES. I so understand the evidence in this case.

Mr. ROWELL. Was it not true there was a guard put aboard these barges, and is it not further true that that guard was afterward withdrawn?

Mr. GEDDES. No, sir; I do not understand such to be the case.

Mr. ROWELL. Is it not true that the gunboats put a guard aboard these boats and afterward withdrew that guard?

Mr. GEDDES. I am not aware any testimony was presented showing that fact.

Mr. ROWELL. Did not the gunboats put a guard on board those barges? I do not refer to any guard coming from Memphis, but to the guard coming from the gunboats.

Mr. FINDLAY. There were two sorts of guards.

Mr. ROWELL. That is it, and the testimony shows guards were put on board these barges from the gunboats, which guards were afterward withdrawn.

Mr. GEDDES. I do not remember that there was any active participation on the part of the Government to take possession of this property or to protect it or to have anything to do with it except as I have read from the testimony.

Mr. BAYNE. I scarcely think, Mr. Chairman, that the argument of the chairman of the Committee on War Claims is a fair one. He has done injustice to a citizen of my State of Pennsylvania, at all events in many of the things which he has said. He has endeavored to create an impression in the minds of the members of the House that Captain Bigley, who makes this claim, is a rich man. Now, to my certain knowledge Captain Bigley is not a rich man. He is not worth a dollar. I do not know what difference it makes, but I simply meet that man of straw with that statement on my part.

He has also attempted to create the impression that perhaps the reason why certain gentlemen favored this claim is because Captain Bigley is a citizen of Pennsylvania. It is scarcely fair to the Representatives of Pennsylvania to attempt to create any such impression. Captain Bigley is no more to me than any other citizen of this country. Captain Bigley is a man whom I casually know. Captain Bigley is an active member of a political party to which I do not belong.

Mr. GEDDES. The gentleman will permit me, I hope, to read from the testimony. The question was raised at the close of what I had to say, and now in reply I will read from the minority report. I did not suppose that any claim would be made in that respect, but in response to that claim I will read from the minority report indorsing the report of the Senate, where it is stated on page 4 that "the claimant supposes he was advised a guard was detailed to protect the coal, but they never reported for duty." That is just as I claimed it.

Mr. BAYNE. The appeal I wish to make in this case is simply based on what I believe to be justice and fairness to this citizen of the country. The fact is very obvious that the Government wanted at Memphis 70,000 bushels of Youghiogheny coal; that an order was sent for that coal; that that order on the part of the Government reached Captain Bigley, and that Captain Bigley delivered that coal at Memphis. Those facts stand out indisputably, and no amount of quibbling or technicality will do away with them. The order for 70,000 bushels of coal was directed to Mr. Blasdel. Mr. Blasdel was also the man who was asked to deliver so many tons of hay. Who Mr. Blasdel was or is I do not know, nor do I care, but the fact is the order came into the possession of Captain Bigley. Captain Bigley provided the coal. He had the order in his pocket when he reached Cairo. He sought the Government officers and told them that it was unsafe to carry that coal to Memphis without a convoy. The Government furnished the convoy to protect that coal in its transit from Cairo to Memphis. The captain of the convoy, fearing to run one night when it was very dark, refused to go on farther and directed Captain Bigley to land. Captain Bigley, or the officer in command of the boat, said that he could not land at the point indicated by the officer in charge of the convoy. The difficulty, Mr. Chairman, of landing a fleet of that sort, some of them containing as much as 600,000 bushels of coal, over 20,000 tons and upward of 42,000,000 pounds in weight—I say the difficulty in controlling a fleet of that kind can not be measured or imagined except by those familiar with the navigation of these large streams under such circumstances—two and a half or three acres of coal floating on the surface of the water in barges and boats, and all of them controlled by one little steamer at the rear of the barges. So when the captain of the convoy required him to land the fleet that night, and he failed because he could not, he went on, and without the aid of the convoy succeeded in taking that coal and landing it on the Arkansas side of the river, two or three miles I believe only from the Memphis wharf proper.

Now, sir, what occurred? He took that coal there and landed it. He encountered a fog when he got there, which prevented him from landing on the Memphis side of the river. He found it impossible to take the coal to any other point than to the identical point to which he did take it. He could not take it to the Memphis wharf proper; it was too large a fleet to be taken there; and more than that, there were boats and barges lying at the wharf at Memphis, and to have attempted to land the fleet at the wharf proper would have resulted in the destruction of a number of boats and barges lying there at the time. But what more have we? He landed the fleet on the Arkansas side of the river, two miles proper from the wharf at Memphis, and there are eight old rivermen, captains and pilots of boats that navigate the Ohio River, experts in this business, who came before the Committee on War Claims, and every one of them swears that according to the customs and rules and practice in the delivery of coal on the Ohio River this was a good delivery. And there is not one tittle of evidence to controvert that fact.

No man comes before the Committee on War Claims and presents an affidavit or alleges in any manner that it was not a good delivery in accordance with the rules governing that traffic. These things must be taken into consideration as indicating the reasons which governed this claimant in the transaction now before us. It must be apparent to any man who will consider the matter and understands the facts that Captain Bigley was authorized to land at that point, because such a fleet as that which conveyed this coal could not be controlled as a skiff or an ordinary boat or a canal-boat or any other small-craft, and that such a landing was a good delivery. He had to do the best he could, as all the rivermen have had to do the best they could before and since, and eight of these men testify that that was a good delivery.

And now what further? Just as soon as the fleet was landed, just the moment that it arrived at that point, Captain Bigley or his officers went over to the Memphis side of the river and notified the Government authorities that the coal was there.

Mr. COSGROVE. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. BAYNE. Yes.

Mr. COSGROVE. Is there anything in the testimony to show that under such circumstances similar freight had been delivered at this point and was considered as a good delivery by the Government officials in charge?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know whether there has been or not, but there is evidence to that effect from others. There is evidence by six or eight old rivermen that they regarded it as a valid and good delivery at the point.

Mr. HOPKINS. If my colleague from Pennsylvania will permit me a moment, I can answer that question by referring to the testimony of John Moore, who was a riverman, and for forty years engaged in this business. He says:

I never delivered any coal to the Government at New Orleans. I delivered coal to the Government at Memphis in 1863. I did not land at the city wharf with any of it. I landed above the mouth of Wolf River, a mile or a mile and a half above the city wharf, where the Government always took charge of the coal upon its arrival and protected it.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. But that is on the Tennessee side of the river.

Mr. COSGROVE. Let me ask were the Federal authorities in possession of the place where the landing of this coal was effected?

Mr. GEDDES. That is just the point of trouble.

Mr. BAYNE. They were in possession of it. The Government gunboats were traversing the river constantly. They had control of that entire shore, and were expected to protect the property of citizens of the United States when they went there, independently of any contract on the part of this man for the delivery of this coal at that point.

My friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] says that this was not a delivery. If that ground be taken away from his argument, if that proposition be eliminated from the report of the majority of the committee, then there is nothing in the world left to stand on. Now, was it delivered?

As I have said, six or eight old rivermen, captains, pilots, and others on the river, who were accustomed to the rules and regulations for the delivery of goods on that river, have all testified that it was a substantial compliance with the order to furnish the coal at Memphis.

It was taken there. The next step that was taken, as I have said, was for Captain Bigley to go over to the city of Memphis and notify the Government that the coal was there. The next thing that was done was for the Government to send over there and take away three of those barges of coal, taking them over separately to the wharf at Memphis. Why did not the Government take over the whole seven? Why did it not take them all over when it took the three? Why did it not prosecute that business and work of taking all these barges over at that time instead of taking only three of them over; and if it was not a delivery why did it take them over at all?

The reason why they did not take the whole seven barges over during that day was because, as testified by one of the witnesses, the whole seven barges could not be landed at the Memphis wharf without imperiling the other craft lying at that wharf. Then what more was done? The Government sent a number of men down to the river edge on the Memphis side to go over and protect those boats against guerrillas or any other interference that might be made with them.

What does the chairman of the Committee on War Claims admit? Why, he admits that after the Government had taken this step to that extent that very same Government ordered these men to the rendezvous or their barracks, and prevented this protection which it had insured by accepting the order to protect them. And yet he says the Government did not take possession of them. Guerrillas came in there and sunk those boats. Bigley was incapable of protecting them. But suppose that the force which went right down to the water's edge on the Memphis side had gone on those boats with rifles and bayonets and stood guard over those boats that night, would they have been destroyed? They would have been protected, and this loss to this citizen would have been averted.

I am amazed to hear anybody say that this was not a contract; and I am amazed to hear anybody say this was not a delivery; I am amazed to hear anybody say that the Government had not actually taken possession of this coal. The transaction was complete in all its parts. It lacked no essential of an executed contract. And the Government, on the strictest legal principles, apart from all the equities, is bound to pay that man that money.

Captain Bigley, as I have said, is a citizen of Pennsylvania. He is a reputable citizen of that State. He has raised a large family in that State, and they are all honorable people. He is a poor man, and the very poverty he is now enduring was brought upon him by the refusal of the Government to pay him what no honest man would withhold from another man under similar circumstances.

I ask Congress as a matter of simple justice, and with no other motive, for I have no interest in the case except to do what is fair and right by this man—I ask the House to pass this bill reported by the minority of the committee as a substitute.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] attempted to create the impression that this was an appeal to the sympathy of this House. It is an appeal to the sense of justice of this House, and nothing else. The speech of the gentleman was very good as an appeal to a common jury. But I apprehend it will not be of equal effect upon intelligent members of this House.

The gentleman from Ohio was unfortunate in not having his memory refreshed as to the facts in this case. He said there was a telegram to Blasdel to furnish this quantity of coal, but it did not appear how this telegram came into the possession of this claimant. If the gentleman had been careful enough to read the next sentence after the telegram itself he would have found this:

That after receiving the said order this affiant [Blasdel] immediately proceeded North for the purpose of fulfilling the same, and in pursuance thereof obtained from N. J. Bigley, of Pittsburgh, 100,000 bushels of coal.

Now, I hope gentlemen will remember Blasdel was the agent of the Government. He was the man authorized to procure and forward this coal. Blasdel testifies that, acting as agent of the Government, he went North and procured from Bigley that quantity of coal. Therefore that answers the statement as to the position of Mr. Bigley. It also answers the further statement that this was a volunteer assumption on the part of Bigley for speculative purposes.

There is nothing to sustain that assertion. The Government officer himself in his telegram fixes the price at 30 cents a bushel. The price is fixed by the Government. The Government agent then goes and seeks out Bigley. Bigley is not a volunteer. He does not carry the coal to Memphis at his own risk. He goes in pursuance of an agreement made with him at Louisville by the agent of the Government authorized to pay him 30 cents a bushel, which price he is willing to take.

The gentleman from Ohio is equally unfortunate in not remembering the facts in connection with the burning of the steamtug Hercules. I quote from the testimony of Daniel Pollard:

> We, that is myself and Captain Langthorne, talked over the fact of the steamer that was then burning, and Captain Langthorne ordered a steamtug of the United States, having on board about twenty or more armed men, to proceed to the burning boat. United States Officer Moorehead was the officer commanding the United States steamtug that went over, and I went on board of her.
> When we reached the place we found she, the steamtug Hercules, was not quite done burning, and that one coal-boat of her tow had been scuttled and sunk, leaving six coal-boats, laden with coal, that were safe; one of these six boats was afire aft, and the hose of the steamtug Captain Moorehead, put out the fire on said coal-boat.

There was the Government gunboat with Government soldiers in charge of the remainder of these boats, six in number. Another towboat, the Cricket, went over; and the boat already referred to, the Wisconsin, owned and controlled by the Government, carried three of these barges across, but it was too late at night to carry over the remaining three, and they were burned.

Now, gentlemen will remember that this was a contract for the delivery of this entire quantity of coal, not one barge, or two barges, or three barges; and I leave it to any lawyer whether under such circumstances the acceptance of a part is not the acceptance of the whole. The Government assumed control and custody of this entire cargo; the Government carried three of the barges across to its own wharf, intending to take the remaining three the same night, but failed to do so because night came on.

Mr. GIBSON (in his seat). The gentleman's law is not good.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is good. I assert that where there is a contract to deliver an entire quantity of coal, and the Government, by its officers, takes charge of six barges containing that coal and carries away three of them to the other side of the river, it assumes control and jurisdiction of the property and accepts a delivery of the whole. The Government in this case had taken all this coal into its custody, and had taken a part of it to another landing, leaving the residue in charge of its own officers.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon that point—whether the Government did take possession of a part of this coal or not—I would like to read a few words from the evidence. On page 11 of the testimony I find the following statement made by the commander of the Hercules, which boat had this cargo in tow.

> They then returned to the river—

He is speaking of the men after they had been captured and paroled—

> They then returned to the river, which they reached about midday on the 18th of February, and were then taken on board the gunboat Cricket, after displaying a white flag, and carried over to Memphis. Immediately on reaching Memphis Peter G. Bigley, myself, and others got a towboat, the Wisconsin, and succeeded in towing over three coal-barges which lay near where the Hercules had been destroyed. Darkness came on, and the captain of the towboat Wisconsin refused to go over again, considering it dangerous.

Now my friend will perceive that the three boats which were towed across the river to Memphis and whose cargo was paid for by the Government were towed over for Mr. Bigley and at his instance—not as an act of the Government.

Mr. HOPKINS. No, sir; the testimony elsewhere shows that the Wisconsin was a Government boat; and on page 21 we have this evidence:

> We were taken out about thirteen miles in the country; the next day we were paroled and permitted to return; found six of the seven boats still afloat, guarded by the United States gunboat Cricket, I believe.

These boats were guarded by the United States gunboat Cricket upon the motion of the Government itself. And before Mr. Bigley or any of his men had an opportunity to confer with any officers of the Government they were captured and carried thirteen miles into the country; and when they returned they found that these boats had been taken possession of by the Government, and were in charge of the gunboat Cricket.

Mr. GEDDES. I would like to have this made clear to me, a plain countryman: If there had already been a delivery complete and perfect on the Arkansas side of the river, how would a subsequent acceptance of three of the boats constitute a new delivery?

Mr. HOPKINS. I say it was in pursuance of the first acceptance and delivery that these boats were then in possession of the Government, whose officers, without consulting Mr. Bigley, took them to another landing. We do not contend that there was a new delivery at all.

Mr. BAYNE. And it was the Government boat that took them across?

Mr. HOPKINS. I have stated that the barges were carried across in charge of the Government; when these men returned from their captivity they found the Government in charge of these boats.

Mr. GEDDES. Would the effort of the Government to relieve those men from the guerrillas on the other side of the river make the Government responsible in this case? Both parties knew that the Arkansas side of the river was in the possession and under the control of the confederates.

Mr. HOPKINS. These coal-boats were landed under the charge of the Government gunboats and under the range of the Government batteries on the Memphis shore, as is proved by the testimony. The opposite side of the river, the Arkansas shore, was in effect in charge of the Federal forces, but a raid was made by guerrillas from the interior, who captured these men and carried them into the country.

Now, there is one other point which I must not overlook. Gentlemen will find upon page 19 a telegram from the colonel and quartermaster to N. J. Bigley:

> Hurry on with your coal to Memphis. We must have it anyhow.

I have already, in answer to a question, referred to the testimony of one of the rivermen. Here is the evidence of eight of them, who, as my colleague [Mr. BAYNE] has said, are reputable men, men experienced in this coal business, and their uniform testimony is that a delivery within a mile or two of the wharf was a legal delivery in accordance with the customs of the coal trade, because it was often impossible to land a fleet of coal-boats at the ordinary landing of a city or town.

Mr. PETERS. What was the distance of the wharf at Memphis to the point where the boats delivered the coal?

Mr. HOPKINS. Simply the width of the river.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, if there be no other gentleman desiring to speak on the pending question I shall move that the final vote be taken on the bill at once; otherwise I shall be compelled to move that the committee rise and go to the House for the purpose of closing debate, so that we may get through with this case before the hour of adjournment is reached. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to occupy a few minutes of time on this bill before the vote is reached.

Mr. McMILLIN. How much?

Mr. HOLMAN. Inside of ten minutes.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask by unanimous consent that all further debate be closed on this case in ten minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. That will not do.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will move, then, that the committee rise for the purpose of going into the House to limit debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1347) for the relief of Capt. Nicholas J. Bigley, reported adversely by the Committee on War Claims, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. McMILLIN. I now move that all debate on the pending bill and amendment be closed in ten minutes after their consideration shall be resumed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman mean general debate on the amendment?

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to close general debate on the pending amendment and bill in ten minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest to my friend to make it thirty minutes. The chairman of the Committee on War Claims, reporting adversely, wishes to be heard, and I also wish to say a word or two, as I have had some familiarity with the question.

Mr. McMILLIN. I fear if we go on for half an hour longer in debating this bill we will not be able to get through with it this evening.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not dispose of the bills already reported from the committee?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that all general debate be closed in ten minutes on the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist on there being a longer time for debate.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana move an amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, I do; I move as an amendment that the debate be allowed to proceed for thirty minutes longer.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 60.

Mr. HOLMAN. In view of the fact that no quorum seems to be present, I think the gentleman from Tennessee will agree that thirty minutes is not unreasonable. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I will make it twenty minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. All right, then; that will be acceptable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, then, understands that the time to which debate is limited is twenty minutes.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar (Mr. Cox, of New York, in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1347) for the relief of Capt. Nicholas J. Bigley, and by order of the House all general debate on the pending bill and amendments thereto is limited to twenty minutes. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope I will have the ear of the committee on two points involved in this discussion, both of which are based on the report of the minority. I trust, too, I shall have the ear of the gentlemen who have joined in this minority report.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is stated in the report made by the minority that Quartermaster Eddy, at Memphis, sent a telegram to one E. S. Blasdel, esq. That telegram is as follows:

DEPOT QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE,
Memphis, January 24, 1863.

E. S. BLASDEL, Esq.:

Furnish to this depot 75,000 to 100,000 bushels of Youghiogheny coal; also 2,000 tons of hay, for which a good market price will be paid; coal at 30 cents, and hay at $27.50 per ton.

A. R. EDDY,
Per DAN. W. SENBE,
Chief Clerk.

Now, no such telegram was sent, and my friend must know that. Mr. Blasdel was at Memphis at the time. He was not engaged in the coal business; he never had been engaged in the coal business. This was a mere order to him to furnish facilities for speculation. The price was a handsome price.

Mr. STORM rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have only ten minutes.

Mr. STORM. But if the gentleman wishes the matter to be understood he must allow us to ask him questions.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. STORM. I wish to ask the gentleman a question, and it is this: Although there may be no direct proof of any special contract between the Government and the claimant, is not the Government by agreeing to take three barge-loads of coal and to pay for them estopped from claiming that there was no contract on that point?

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not my friend from Pennsylvania going far ahead of the point I am discussing? Blasdel started up the river with this order, and, according to the testimony, he delivered one of these at Louisville to the present claimant. There was no relation between the present claimant, Captain Bigley, and the quartermaster at Memphis. It was purely an order given to Blasdel that if he should deliver coal it should be at so much per bushel. There was no obligation resting on Blasdel or anybody else to deliver to the Government a pound of coal. The order was that if they should deliver coal to the Government it would be at that price.

I say upon my own responsibility that the party to whom the order was delivered was in no wise connected with the coal business in any manner, shape, or form. I do not say so much upon examination of the papers in connection with the present case as upon a thorough examination of this subject which I had occasion to give to it some years ago, perhaps some ten or twelve years since. However, as soon as Mr. Bigley obtained this order or telegram addressed to E. S. Blasdel he procured the coal and proceeded on his way to Memphis. The testimony shows conclusively that this extraordinary paragraph of the report of the minority is entirely a misapprehension. It says:

The evidence shows conclusively that the claimant was acting under the direct and positive orders of the agent of the Government, and that the loss of the property above mentioned was in no way chargeable to his neglect or carelessness.

Mr. STORM. It is a fact nevertheless.

Mr. HOLMAN. Nobody pretends to say that it was the result of his neglect or carelessness, and even if it had been said, it is a matter that is entirely unimportant in connection with this case. My friend from Pennsylvania knows that he was not acting under the orders of the Government at all. The captain of the steamer Hercules claims, and most of the testimony states the fact, that before reaching Memphis a heavy fog arose, and it was not deemed safe to land upon the Tennessee side of the river; consequently he concluded to land the fleet on the Arkansas side. Immediately on landing this guerrilla raid was made upon the party, and boats and men were captured and taken possession of by the raiders. It seems, however, that somebody connected with the fleet got across the river and came back the next day, when it is alleged that a Government vessel transported them across the river. Now, the facts in the case are that they did not apply to the Government at all.

No application was made to the Government to take control of that fleet. They applied to the steamer Wisconsin, and when they next crossed the river it was in this steamer, which succeeded in procuring three of the barges of coal and delivering them upon the Memphis side, where they were accepted by the Government and paid for. It has been stated as an argument in support of this claim that the delivery of a portion of the coal—the partial delivery—constituted a delivery of the whole. But this delivery, this partial delivery, for which payment was made, was made in Memphis, not on the Arkansas side of the river. Gentlemen will perceive the distinction. There was no mutual contract at all. There was no agreement on the part of Captain Bigley to deliver so many boat-loads of coal to the Government, and on delivery to receive so many dollars for the service. But there was simply a proposition on the part of the Government that if you will deliver to us so many bushels of coal at Memphis you shall receive a good price for it; and, of course, so much of the coal as was actually delivered should be paid for, and I think to the extent of the three boat-loads actually delivered it was paid for. Unhappily, however, that very night the other boats were destroyed by guerrillas, which had possession of the opposite shore.

Gentlemen attempt in this argument to assume by way of support of this claim that the Government made efforts to protect this property and protected it as a part of the Government property. I must confess that when I first examined this case I was rather inclined to that opinion myself and thought it was entitled to some force, but after a more careful examination of the matter, on examining the reports of the Treasury officials, or perhaps some officer of the Quartermaster's Department, I find that it has no weight at all. It is a fact which will be verified by persons who are familiar with the circumstances existing there that the Government was engaged at this particular period in protecting property of its citizens on both sides of the river, and it protected this property of this citizen the same as if it had been the property of the Government. But it must be remembered also that it recognized the property as the property of Mr. Bigley, and just as it recognized and protected the property of other citizens. For Mr. Bigley was not bound to deliver that coal to the Government if he did not think proper. He was under no obligation to the Government to do so. If he did not deliver it he would have received no pay; that was all. But if he did deliver it, he would have received pay according to the terms of the order issued a month or more before.

I therefore submit the fact that the steamboat Wisconsin having taken the three barges of coal across the river proves nothing except the mere fact. It is not the act of the Government, and even if so it would prove nothing but that the Government was pursuing its general policy in protecting the property of loyal citizens as far as possible.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that before the steamer Wisconsin had anything to do with the boats, even before these people got them back from the possession of the guerrillas, when they returned they found these barges in possession—six of them—of United States soldiers and before the steamship Wisconsin had anything to do with the matter?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will say this: The captain of the steamboat Hercules—and any gentleman who reads this testimony will attach much importance to his statement, for he seems to have been a careful, impartial person; I refer to the officer of the vessel which was burnt, although he makes no reference to that—but it is undoubtedly true, as he testifies, that the Government had in front of Memphis at that time and for a long time before and afterward more or less of vessels constantly patrolling the river to protect under their guns as far as possible the property of citizens on both sides of the river. Any gentleman who happened to be at Memphis at that time will remember the fact, for it was notorious. This very vessel, the Cricket, to which reference has been made in this testimony, was engaged, and had been for a long time, protecting the property of loyal citizens on either shore, especially that within the reach of the guerrillas on the left side of the river. But the mere fact that the Government sent a gunboat or sent men or sent a whole regiment of men, if you please, to protect this property from the guerrillas on the Arkansas side of the river proves nothing in support of this claim, for it was just such an act as the Government was doing constantly with reference to the property of loyal citizens there, and was an act done in the exercise of its general powers to protect private property from destruction. That and nothing else.

Mr. Chairman, from the time I first examined this claim, a good many years ago——

Mr. STORM. How many?

Mr. HOLMAN. Ten or twelve.

Mr. STORM. The first I see anything of its appearance is in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think you will find it extends away back beyond that. I will not be certain, but I think it is several years since I reported on this measure myself. While this measure was in the hands of a bank at Baltimore, which was perhaps three or four years ago——

Mr. STORM. That is nearer it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bank was pressing this claim on Congress, and I felt then, as I have always felt when the measure was under the control of Bigley, that it was one which required and demanded a careful examination. And I must say that during the time it has been under Bigley's control, as it is now, and as it was when it first came into Congress, I thought he was himself entitled, as an amiable gentleman who had been manifestly eager to aid the Government as far as he could by furnishing coal at various points—he was entitled, I say, to every consideration. He had been employed by the Government and had executed such contracts time and again on express orders or telegrams from the Government. So far as I know, this was the only instance where he had attempted to make a shipment except on contract with the Government itself. Here he was dealing with Mr. Blasdel and not with the Government. He got a mere permission to ship the coal; nothing less, nothing more.

It will be observed that until Mr. Bigley and his men crossed the river and employed the Wisconsin to go over and tow the three boats the Government had no notice whatever even of Blasdel's transaction. It had no notice of it up to the time the Wisconsin crossed the river and towed the three boats over——

Mr. HOPKINS. I am sure the gentleman does not desire to misrepresent the facts.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. HOPKINS. And therefore I call his attention to the testimony of Daniel Pollard, who was an officer on the United States boat V. F. Wilson, in which he says:

I wish to add to the above statement that Captain Langthorne said he was aware that the coal was for United States Government use, that is, for the United States Army department.

Mr. HOLMAN. How could he have known it that evening? Why, the very moment the boats landed it was boarded by guerrillas.

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, no!

Mr. HOLMAN. The first notice the Government had was when the three boats were delivered on the other side.

Mr. GEDDES. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has only six minutes remaining.

Mr. GEDDES. Then I yield what time I have to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WOLFORD. My distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] says there was an order. Now I assert there is no sense in which this telegraphic dispatch can be called a military order. An order delivered to whom and by whom? I say there is no sense in that claim; it is not an order.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania and other gentlemen have argued that it was a contract. I take it that there is not anything in this case that shows a contract. There was a proposition to receive so many bushels of coal, and to pay 30 cents a bushel for it. There is no proof in this case, and nobody pretends that that proposition was accepted. Neither by letter nor by telegraphic dispatch nor by messenger nor by any other way was there an acceptance. It is what we understand in our country to be a simple proposition, that may be accepted or may not be accepted. That is the way lawyers understand it in Kentucky.

I presume every lawyer understands an unaccepted proposition is not a contract. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, then, is mistaken about the order; he is mistaken about the contract. There was neither an order nor a contract. But a man voluntarily, for the purpose of making money, undertakes, of his own volition and according to his own mind, to make money out of the Government; he undertakes to deliver a certain amount of coal. He starts with it; sends word that he is unable to get through. Gentlemen say the Government sent assistance. But it seems to me the claimant violated the instruction of the Government officer who requested him to land, and whenever he refused to land he took out of the power of the Government any assistance that the Government offered him. He took his own risk. He says, "I know better than you." The officer commanding the gunboat says, "I will not go into that danger, I will not risk loss to my command and to the country, and therefore I will not go." Thereupon the claimant of his own accord voluntarily says, "I will go;" and he did go.

Now, that is the state of facts in this case. That is the statement of the gentlemen as they make it themselves.

But where does he land the coal? Gentlemen say there is proof here by experts that he landed it at a place where it was common to land it in time of war. Arkansas was then in the hands of the confederates; Tennessee in the hands of Union forces under McPherson; both parties were contending for the mastery; both parties were watching vigilantly for an opportunity to get anything they could that the others were grasping at. If the confederates could get this coal and destroy that much of our power they had a right under the rules of war to do it.

The claimant then chooses to land not on the side where it had been the custom heretofore to land supplies. He landed the coal on the confederate side. The great Mississippi rolls between the two forces. On his own authority this man lands this coal on the confederate side; and now he comes here and modestly asks the Government to pay him for the consequences of his own mistake. The guerrillas, it appears, captured and robbed him. He has my sympathies for what he suffered from the guerrillas; but if he had staid under the protection of the United States gunboats would the guerrillas have captured and robbed him? No. Believing that he was competent to take care of himself, he went to the other side of the river and was captured, and some of his boats were sunk. The Government undertook to protect him so far as it could. But is there a man in this Congress that had anything to do with the war who does not know that both parties did all they could to protect the men on their own side? It matters not about the contract. Here was coal which the Government wanted, and they sent men to protect it. I have seen similar things done a hundred times.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for debate has expired. The first question is upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] as a substitute for the bill. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Nicholas J. Bigley the sum of $21,211.40 for 70,638 bushels of coal lost at Memphis, Tenn., in the month of February, 1863."

The question being taken on agreeing to the substitute, there were—ayes 63, noes 78

Mr. BAYNE. I make the point that no quorum has voted, and call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GEDDES and Mr. BAYNE were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 79.

Mr. BAYNE. I have proposed to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES], who is ready to accept the proposition, that a vote on this question be taken by yeas and nays in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that by unanimous consent it be agreed that the bill with the pending amendment be reported by the Committee of the Whole without recommendation for the action of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there unanimous consent that this bill with the proposed substitute be reported to the House without recommendation for the action of the House? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

A. H. HERR.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask that the House now take up the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the title of a bill coming up under this order as unfinished business, having been pending at the adjournment of the House on the 27th of June last.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4380) for the relief of A. H. Herr.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of this bill, the previous question having been ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. MCMILLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SARAH E. WEBSTER.

The House proceeded to consider as the first bill reported to-day from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar the bill (H. R. 4679) for the relief of Sarah E. Webster, administratrix.

The SPEAKER. This bill has been reported with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCMILLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAMP DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION.

The next business in order, having been reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with a recommendation that it pass, was the bill (H. R. 1782) to authorize the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department certain parts of the Camp Douglas military reservation, in the Territory of Utah.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 478, which is now on the Speaker's table, and is precisely like this bill of the House, be taken up and considered in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that this House bill be laid aside and a Senate bill of similar purport be taken from the Speaker's table for consideration. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill (S. 478) to authorize the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department certain parts of the Camp Douglas military reservation, in the Territory of Utah, was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. McMILLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, with the recommendation that they do pass, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 948) for the relief of John M. Dorsey and William F. Shepard;

A bill (H. R. 1566) for the relief of O. L. Cochran, late postmaster at Houston, Tex., reimbursing him for money erroneously collected from him by the Post-Office Department;

A bill (H. R. 1266) for the relief of Alexander D. Schenck;

A bill (H. R. 4684) for the relief of certain citizens of Marion County, Tennessee.

The amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar to the bill (H. R. 691) for the relief of William W. Thomas was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

The bill (H. R. 4683) to pay certain officers of the Army for services actually rendered during the late war, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar adversely, was laid on the table.

ELIZABETH CARSON.

Mr. WILLIS. What has become of the bill (S. 12) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that it was not reported, but informally passed over in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar and not again taken up.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the House, after I have made a statement, will be willing to pass this bill. It was considered in the Committee of the Whole House and the question was raised as to whether or not the substitute had been printed. It was passed over informally until examination could be made. The substitute was found to have been printed, and the remedy of the gentleman from Kentucky is to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask then, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be put upon its passage.

There was no objection, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, do pay to Elizabeth Carson, of Bourbon County, Kentucky, the sum of $2,630.50, in full satisfaction for subsistence, use of jail, fuel, fire, care, and attention furnished by her to conscripts, deserters, and rebel prisoners confined in the jail of Bourbon County, Kentucky, by the military authorities of the United States, in the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865.

Mr. WILLIS. Now let the Clerk read the substitute reported from the Committee on War Claims.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be investigated by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army the claim of Elizabeth Carson, of Bourbon County, State of Kentucky, for subsistence, use of jail, fuel, fire, care, and attention alleged to have been furnished by her to conscripts, deserters, and rebel prisoners confined in the jail of Bourbon County, Kentucky, by the military authorities of the United States, in the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865; such investigation to extend to the status of the claimant, whether loyal or not, the value of the supplies furnished, the actual rental value of the property for the time it was occupied and used by the United States authorities, the circumstances of the use of the jail and by whose authority or direction it was so used, and the reasons for the neglect to file her claim in the War Department; and when such investigation shall be completed the Secretary of War shall report the result thereof, with his recommendation thereon, to Congress, for its action in the premises.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McMILLIN moved to reconsider the several votes which had been taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPT. NICHOLAS J. BIGLEY.

The SPEAKER. The question next recurs on the bill (H. R. 1347) for the relief of Capt. Nicholas J. Bigley, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with amendments.

Mr. BAYNE. I move to take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. McMILLIN. The bill was reported back without any recommendation and was to be passed over until a yea-and-nay vote could be taken when a quorum was present.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think in accordance with the understanding that the yeas and nays ought to be ordered now on the substitute proposed to the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no objection to that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House now take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night, under the prior order of the House.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen have bills and resolutions which they desire to offer for reference; if there be no objection the Chair will entertain such requests at this time.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no objection to that, and withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. REED submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN is designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore during the session of the House this evening.

J. G. CARLISLE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, directed the Clerk to read the special order of the House in relation to the business for this evening.

The Clerk read as follows:

That until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 8 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of pension bills on the Private Calendar under the special order of the House which has just been read.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that the business of this evening may begin with the Calendar at the top of page 45.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DANIEL W. ADAMS.

The first business on the Private Calendar, beginning on page 45, was the bill (H. R. 7141) granting a pension to Daniel W. Adams.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Daniel W. Adams, late of Company A, Ninety-third Indiana Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask for the reading of the report. I shall ask for the reading of the reports in all the cases to be considered this evening.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7141) granting a pension to Daniel W. Adams, respectfully report:

That claimant enlisted in the military service of the United States as a private in Company A, Ninety-third Regiment Indiana Volunteers, August 9, 1862, and was discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability February 11, 1863.

June 23, 1880, he filed a declaration for pension (alleging that a cold contracted at Madison, Ind., November 10, 1862, resulted in disease of heart and lungs), which was rejected May 5, 1883, on the ground that disability is not due to military service.

It is shown by both medical and lay testimony that claimant was a sound, healthy man prior to and at the time of his enlistment in the military service of the United States.

It is disclosed by the evidence of two of the commissioned officers of claimant's company and three or four comrades of the soldier that while in camp at Indianapolis, Ind., soldier contracted disease of heart and lungs, and that at Madison, Ind., he was compelled, by reason of his disabilty, to go to hospital, where he was treated; but the character of disability is not disclosed by the record.

The surgeon's certificate of disability for the discharge of the soldier says the disability existed prior to enlistment.

The existence of disease of heart and lungs, for which the soldier was discharged, is shown to have continued from the time of its incurrence while in the military service and in line of duty to the present time. And the United States examining surgeon, Columbus, Ind., in an examination of the soldier, January 12, 1882, reports him totally disabled from this disability.

His case was investigated in March, 1883, by a special examiner of the Pension Office. In this examination Dr. John S. Arwine, of Columbus, Ind., testifies to an acquaintance with claimant from 1856 to the date of his enlistment, and that he was a sound man at the time of his said enlistment.

Daniel H. Sharp, of Columbus, Ind., testifies, March 23, 1883:

"That he has known claimant since 1857; lived about one-half mile from him from 1857 to July, 1861; saw him almost every day; he was then as stout a young fellow as there was in the neighborhood, and was so up to July, 1861, when I enlisted in the Army; saw him at log-rollings, and he was as good a lifter as we had; but at jumping he was never behind; I have often seen him run, jump, and lift; never knew him to be sick in any way."

John White, of Columbus, Ind., testifies, April 2, 1883:

"That he has known claimant since August, 1861; lived within three-fourths of a mile of him, and in the fall of 1861 shucked corn with him in the same field, and knew him well from that time until after harvest, 1862; saw him every two or three days; worked together about two months of that time, chopped wood together, and I helped him in harvest time 1862; he was then a good, sound man, did a good, fair day's work; and I never knew or heard of his being sick any of that time."

James E. Hammond, of Columbus, Ind., says:

"I first knew claimant in 1860, and have known him ever since; worked with him from August, 1860, to March, 1861. During part of the time we eat together and slept and worked together; he was then a stout, able-bodied man."

This testimony given above is very fully corroborated by all the witnesses examined by the special examiner from the Pension Office; all were neighbors and intimate acquaintances of claimant prior to and at the time of his enlistment, and the testimony as to the soundness of the soldier at the time of his enlistment is conclusive.

There is no doubt in the case as to the right of this soldier to a pension, and your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET A. MAGUIRE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6726) granting a pension to Margaret A. Maguire.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret A. Maguire, of Philadelphia, Pa., widow of George R. Maguire, deceased, late a lieutenant in the Thirteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, United States Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. PATTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6726) granting a pension to Margaret A. Maguire, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Margaret A. Maguire is the widow of George R. Maguire, who served as first lieutenant and captain, respectively, in the Thirteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry, from October 20, 1862, to July 14, 1865. At the date of his death, June 8, 1879, he was in receipt of total pension for varicose veins of left leg, the result of typhoid fever contracted about June 1, 1863.

The claim of the widow has been rejected on the ground that the soldier's fatal disease, cancer of the bowels, was not chargeable to the military service.

It appears that Maguire came under the medical treatment of Dr. J. A. Holton, of Centreville, Md., March 22, 1879, for cerebro-spinal trouble and partial paralysis of entire right side, which, in the opinion of the physician, was caused by blood poisoning, the result of healing up of the ulcers of the leg, by which the drain from said ulcers was thrown back into the circulation, and general marasmus was produced. Previous to that time the soldier was confined to his room for weeks at a time by reason of the diseased condition of the leg, during which periods he was unable to retain anything in the stomach, as shown by the affidavit of Dr. Eugene Wiley. Recovering somewhat after three or four weeks' treatment by Dr. Holton, the soldier was removed to his home at Philadelphia, where he came under treatment by Dr. F. H. Gitchell, who testifies that when Maguire first came in his charge he was much broken down from the trouble with his leg, and, in the opinion of the affiant, would have recovered from the cancer of the bowels, which caused death, had it not been for the general impairment of his health by reason of the diseased leg.

The medical referee of the Pension Office admits that cancer is held to be referable to a blood taint, and implies the existence of such a cause necessarily, but denies that death in this case was caused by the condition of the soldier's leg.

The question to be decided by this committee is whether the opinion of that officer, who has had no personal knowledge of the case, should be accepted in opposition to the sworn statement of the attending physicians, who, from a professional knowledge of the case, are better able to judge that the cancer was caused by blood poisoning, superinduced by the too rapid healing of the ulcers of the leg.

The committee are clearly of opinion that the latter should govern its action in the determination of claimant's rights, and that whatever doubts may exist should be solved in her favor, and therefore report favorably on the bill and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET A. RINGWALT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4266) granting a pension to Margaret A. Ringwalt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret A. Ringwalt, sister of Lewis Ringwalt, late of Company F, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, and to pay her the pension allowed by law to the dependent relatives of deceased soldiers.

The report (by Mr. PATTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4266) granting a pension to Margaret Ringwalt, having duly considered the evidence in the case, report:

That Margaret A. Ringwalt is the dependent sister of Lewis Ringwalt, who enlisted in the military service of the United States as a private in Company F, Seventeenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, September 15, 1862, and was killed in action near Newtown, Va., by guerrillas October 11, 1864.

It appears that claimant is the sister of the deceased soldier, and lived with and was supported wholly by the soldier prior to his enlistment in the military service of the United States, and the fact that he contributed his pay as a soldier for the support of claimant is shown by the letters written to claimant at the time of sending the money, and by the testimony of the neighbors of claimant.

It is shown that claimant was never married, leaves neither father nor mother surviving, and that when 9 years of age she lost the sight of the left eye, and that she is now unable to perform any labor, as she has been an invalid for years, and is now over 71 years of age and without any means, and entirely dependent upon the charity of neighbors and friends for her maintenance.

The manner of the death of the soldier is shown by the following extract from a special correspondent of the New York Tribune, writing from Sheridan's army near Strasburg, Va., October 11, 1864, and which was published in the New York Tribune of October 18, 1864:

"A courier, arrived at headquarters at an early hour this morning, brings a report that the chief quartermaster of the Army, Lieutenant-Colonel Tolles, and Dr. Ohlenberger, medical inspector of the Army, had been shot by guerrillas on the road near Newtown. About 9 o'clock p. m. two ambulances came in, bringing both these gentlemen, mortally wounded. A brave old soldier named Lewis Ringwalt, belonging to Company F, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, one of the escort, was also brought in. Colonel Tolles had a bullet wound in the back of his head, and one in his body. His face was also badly scarified, as if he had fallen from his horse or had been dragged over the rough pikes. The officers were returning from Martinsburg, with an escort of twenty-five men, and when about half way between Newtown and Middletown a company of guerrillas, led by 'White,' numbering from fifty to seventy-five, suddenly charged out of a belt of woods from the left of the road, firing as they came, and calling out to the officers to surrender. Seeing they were outnumbered, the escort endeavored to escape, but being well mounted the rebels overtook or cut them off, the officers being left in the rear. For some distance it was a running fight, in which the guerrillas had the advantage in numbers, being the pursuing party.

"The escort evidently did more running than fighting, only a portion of them using their carbines to any advantage. Ringwalt evidently fought with desperation, as he had one finger shot off, a serious scalp wound, and a mortal wound through the body. Ringwalt says the officers surrendered. Colonel Tolles's orderly says the same. Dr. Ohlenberger also surrendered; but the rebels rode close up to them, and putting their pistols to their heads fired, inflicting mortal wounds. One of our men was killed, named Samuel Deardorp, and seven were wounded. Ringwalt shot one of the guerrillas, and with the assistance of a part of the escort six or seven were wounded. The officers and men were robbed of money and watches. While the rebels were engaged in stripping their victims a party of infantry, who were accompanying a train, were seen coming up, and the guerrillas made off, taking one of our ambulances for their wounded. They carried off about half of the escort as prisoners.

"Colonel Tolles and Dr. Ohlenberger, with the wounded private, Ringwalt, were placed in ambulances and brought to General Sheridan's headquarters, where their wounds were dressed. Both officers were pronounced to be mortally wounded.

"The event has produced a sentiment of profound grief at the headquarters of the Army. Colonel Tolles was a most valuable officer, and a gentleman who had become greatly endeared to the officers during a long connection with the service. It is the general remark that he had no superior in the Army as an able and efficient quartermaster. He was a captain in the Fifteenth Infantry.

"Dr. Ohlenberger was also an officer of rare ability, and a gentleman who enjoyed the esteem and affection of a wide circle in the Army. They will be a great loss to the Army.

"October 12.—Lewis Ringwalt died early this morning. His family live near Carlisle, Pa. His faithful and soldierly conduct during this treacherous and overpowering attack upon the officers whom he was guarding entitles his memory to respect and his dependent family to the clemency of the Government.

"E. S."

The Philadelphia Press of Wednesday, October 26, 1864, says:

"DEATH OF A GALLANT SOLDIER.

"Lewis Ringwalt, a sergeant in Company F, of the Seventeenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, died on the 12th instant, near Strasburg, Va., from the effects of wounds received from guerrillas on the day previous, while gallantly guarding the medical inspector of Sheridan's army. As we have before stated, Lewis Ringwalt died on the 12th instant. The case of this brave soldier is entitled to more than ordinary notice. Surrounded by a large and influential circle of relatives and friends, residing near Carlisle, Pa., he was early impressed with the conviction that it was his religious duty to go forth and battle for his country, and while he had frequent opportunities for promotion, he declined them all, and preferred remaining in a humble position. The writer of this article knew him well, and has frequently heard of the valor he displayed on more than one occasion. His death will be deeply deplored, not only by his immediate family and a large number of our citizens in the locality where he lived, but by his fellow-soldiers, to whom he endeared himself by his kind and genial manner, and by the coolness and bravery he manifested in many perilous engagements."

December 17, 1883, General P. H. Sheridan certifies to the death of Lewis Ringwalt by wounds received from guerrillas between Winchester and Fisher's Hill, in October, 1864.

December 31, 1879, claimant filed her declaration for pension, which was rejected June 20, 1883, on the ground that the evidence filed by claimant shows that at date of soldier's death she was over sixteen years of ago, therefore not entitled under the law.

Your committee find claimant was dependent on the deceased soldier for maintenance and support, and is now in her old age deprived of her means of support by the casualties of the late war, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the simple fact that this is adding a new class to the pension-rolls. The law gives to the dependent father or mother of a soldier who died in the service from wounds received or diseases contracted in the service a pension. That is the general law. It does not include a sister or a brother. This bill extends that provision of the law in this particular case upon strong grounds. I admit there are strong reasons for it, and that there are strong equities arising out of the circumstances of this case. I simply wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that it is a departure from the general law on this subject.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ESTHER HUDSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2645) granting a pension to Esther Hudson, mother of William H. Hudson, deceased, late of Company G, Twenty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and Company E, One hundred and ninety-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Esther Hudson, mother of William H. Hudson, deceased, late a private in Company G, Twenty-sixth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, and afterward a sergeant of Company E, One hundred and ninety-first Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, and to pay her, or cause to be paid her, a pension at said rate from the death of her said son, subject to the general laws should she again marry or her dependence upon her son cease.

The bill was reported with the following amendment:

In line 10 strike out these words: "At said rate from the death of her said son, subject to the general laws should she again marry or her dependence upon her son cease."

The report (by Mr. PATTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2645) granting a pension to Esther Hudson, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

That Esther Hudson was the mother of William H. Hudson, who enlisted as a private in Company G, Twenty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and afterward a sergeant of Company E, One hundred and ninety-first Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, serving from the year 1861 to the close of the war.

At the time he enlisted and some years prior he lived with and aided his mother in obtaining a living, and during the time of his service in the Army sent her part of his wages.

It appears on file in Pension Department that the said soldier, in the month of November, 1861, prior to his entering the service of the United States, made a will, in which he bequeaths to his mother all his pay, bounty, or money in any way due him; and as evidence that the said mother did receive support from her son, the committee find on file in Pension Department letter from Second Auditor's Office, dated February 19, 1870, notifying Esther Hudson, mother, that certificate had been issued for money due William H. Hudson.

The committee also find from the evidence on file in department that the Commissioner of Pensions rejected the claim of Esther Hudson because of the marriage of said William H. Hudson some time prior to enlistment, and it is alleged that he never lived with his wife; and it also appears on file in Pension Department that an application for divorce was granted at Philadelphia, Pa., May 7, 1864.

In view of the facts, your committee believe that Esther Hudson was dependent on her son for support, and recommend that the bill (H. R. 2645) do pass as amended, namely:

Strike out all of line 10 after the word "pension," and also strike out lines 11 and 12 of said bill.

The amendment reported by the committee was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I wish to call attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that it is nowhere stated in this report that this soldier is dead. I suppose that you might infer that he was dead, for the report states that his mother had applied for a pension and her application was rejected on the ground that the soldier had a wife or a widow.

If it should appear that the soldier is dead the report fails to show that his death had any connection whatever with his services in the war. It is not every dependent mother or every dependent father of a soldier that is entitled to a pension upon the death of a soldier under the general law. Under the general law the dependent father or dependent mother is entitled to a pension provided the death of the soldier was caused by his service in the war. Now if this soldier's death was caused by his service in the war, the House, so far as this report is concerned, is in ignorance of that fact; and if the gentleman making this report is not in his seat, if any gentleman upon the committee can remember the facts in relation to this matter I would like to hear them before we are called upon to vote.

Mr. MATSON. My impression, and I think I may say my recollection, is that the question of the death of this soldier was not at issue at all. If I remember correctly, the death of the soldier was upon the field of battle. At any rate, I am very sure there was no question and no dispute of that kind in this case.

The only question was as to the right of this mother to a pension, the soldier having been married and subsequently divorced. She seemed to show that she was in a dependent condition, and wholly dependent upon this soldier. Hence the committee did not hesitate to recommend the passage of the bill. I feel perfectly safe in saying there was no question at all as to the cause of the soldier's death being connected with the service.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MATSON] to the very first clause of the report in this case, showing that this soldier was not killed in battle during the war. The report states that he served from 1861 to the close of the war, that he was a sergeant in Company E, One hundred and ninety-first Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, serving from the year 1861 to the close of the war.

I think this case had better be passed over. If the death of the soldier was caused by service in the war that fact ought to be stated in the report, so as to go on record. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PATTON] who reported this bill is not now in the House, let it go over till he comes in.

Mr. MATSON. I have no objection to allowing the bill to be passed over informally if the gentleman from Alabama so desires.

Mr. PATTON. My impression is that this soldier, William H. Hudson, died soon after coming home, and from wounds received while in the service. The question raised in the Pension Department was whether his mother was dependent. He had been married and his wife had obtained a divorce. It appears, as stated in the report, that there is on file in the Pension Department a letter from the Second Auditor's Office, dated February 19, 1870, notifying the mother that a certificate had been issued to her for money due Hudson, who had made a will bequeathing to his mother all his pay, bounty, or money in any way due him.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentlemen speaks of his "impression" concerning the cause of the soldier's death. Is he satisfied of the fact?

Mr. PATTON. No, I am not.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then this bill ought to be passed over till the question can be examined. The point is one on which of course the House ought to be satisfied.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] asks unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside informally. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PLEASANT MINET.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4751) granting a pension to Pleasant Minet.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be reported to the House with a recommendation that it lie on the table, as the man has, since the bill was reported, received a pension through the ordinary channel.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it lie on the table.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

HENRY DAVIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6997) granting a pension to Henry Davis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Henry Davis, late lieutenant-colonel of the Eighty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and conditions of the pension laws.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6997) granting a pension to Henry Davis, report:

That claimant enlisted in the military service of the United States as lieutenant-colonel of the Eighty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteers, August 27, 1862, and resigned October 1, 1863, on account of inability to stand the hardships of the service.

June 11, 1883, he filed an application for pension, alleging that at the battle of Chickamauga, September 20, 1863, he contracted hernia, which was rejected January 30, 1884, on the ground that claimant did not mention the disability in his resignation from the service.

Dr. John W. Newland, of Bedford, Ind., testifies, June 11, 1883, that he has known claimant for twenty-five years or more; was his family physician while he lived at Bedford before enlistment; he was then a sound, healthy man, free from hernia. About ten years ago he consulted affiant in reference to the use of the Egelson truss. At that time I made a personal examination of him, and found that he was ruptured on both sides at the lower extremities of the abdomen.

Dr. Addison W. Bare, Bryantsville, Ind., testifies, "that about September 20, 1862, the date of claimant's enlistment, and prior thereto, I was his family physician, and consequently very intimately acquainted with him; that he was then a sound man, in good health, and free from hernia."

Charles D. Briggs, Isola, Kans., testifies:

"At the battle of Chickamauga, September 20, 1863, I saw claimant at the time he received his injury. He was serving on foot with the regiment. I saw him fall during the heat of the battle, and supposed he was killed, and it was so understood along the line. He, however, only received an injury from which hernia of both sides ensued. Knows this from personal knowledge and being present at the time."

In answer to a letter from the Pension Office, the witness further says:

"I believe his hernia was received from an accident on the battlefield of Chickamauga. Companies A, B, and C, of the Eighty-second Indiana, were detailed with Churche's Fourth Michigan Battery to act as skirmishers, and while upon said line the rebel forces attempted to take said battery. Lieutenant-Colonel Davis started to that point to rally some of the men, when his foot caught in a root or his saber, and he fell heavily upon the same, which I think penetrated the groin and produced hernia, as I understood at the time."

Calvin E. Pearson, of Alaska, Ind., testifies to substantially the same as above witness.

Morton C. Hunter, colonel of claimant's regiment, testifies:

"At the battle of Chickamauga we were dismounted on account of the nearness of the enemy, and we were in the woods. My regiment formed the second line of the Third Brigade, Third Division, Fourteenth Army Corps. The first line was driven back and passed over my regiment, which at the time was lying down. After they had passed over I ordered my regiment to fire; then ordered a charge, which drove the enemy back and regained the breastwork from which the first line had been driven. I ordered Col. Henry Davis to deploy the two right companies and protect my right flank. This order he promptly obeyed. Colonel Davis with his line of skirmishers was driven back slowly, fighting from tree to tree. While going back his sword-scabbard was struck by a ball, the former getting between his legs, throwing him down. From this fall Colonel Davis was injured. I saw his saber-scabbard a few minutes afterward, and it was bent from having been struck by a ball."

In addition to the evidence specifically referred to above, it is clearly shown that the soldier was free from disease at the time of his enlistment, and that his disability has continued from the time of his discharge from the service, being given by the United States examining board of Mitchell, Ind., in an examination made September 5, 1883, at three-fourths total. In view of these facts your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

SAMUEL W. TRACEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 435) granting a pension to Samuel W. Tracey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Samuel W. Tracey, late of Company E, Twenty-fifth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 435) granting a pension to Samuel W. Tracey, having considered the evidence, respectfully report:

That claimaint was mustered into the military service of the United States as a private in Company E, Twenty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, September 19, 1864, and honorably discharged June 4, 1865.

October 16, 1878, he filed a declaration for pension, alleging that, about December, 1864, about forty miles from Savannah, Ga., while tearing up a railroad, he received an injury to his back, causing disease of kidneys, which was rejected April 10, 1879, on the ground that no disability exists from cause alleged.

William K. Stewart, of Spencer County, Indiana, testifies that he was second lieutenant of claimant's company and regiment, and that the soldier was severely injured at the place, at the time, and in the manner stated in his declaration for pension.

Dr. E. S. Arwine, of Bedford, Ind., testifies that soldier came under his professional treatment in 1875 for disease of the kidneys, and that he continued to treat him for said disability until the year 1882, when affiant moved to Texas; that during the time he so treated him he was one-half disabled from the performance of manual labor.

Dr. U. N. Mellette, of Johnson County, Indiana, testifies to having treated claimant for disease of the kidneys during the year 1874.

Dr. J. T. Mattock, of Hartsburg, Logan County, Illinois, testifies that he treated claimant for kidney disease from September, 1865, until January, 1867, and that the soldier was unable to get out of bed or help himself during that period.

Joseph M. Young and Robert H. Fowler, of Brown County, Indiana, in a joint affidavit, testify, October 2, 1882, that they have been near neighbors and intimate acquaintances of claimant from the year 1867, and that during that time he has been suffering from kidney disease, and has been disabled for the performance of manual labor at least one-half of said time by reason of his disability.

Claimant is shown to have been a sound, healthy man at the time of entering the military service of the United States.

Manly Mead and Alexander Condon, of Brown County, Indiana, whose reputation as citizens is shown to be of a high character by a number of the county officers in the county in which they reside, testify to an intimate acquaintance with claimant and a personal knowledge of his condition since he came home from the Army in June, 1865, and that during this time he has been suffering from disease of the kidneys and back, and that he has been disabled at least one-half from the performance of manual labor by reason of the same.

The United States examining board of Indianapolis, Ind., in an examination of claimant, September 27, 1882, rate him at one-fourth.

Your committee are of the opinion that it is clearly shown that the disability of the soldier was contracted in the military service of the United States and in line of duty, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

ABRAHAM COVER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4021) granting a pension to Abraham Cover.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Abraham Cover, late first lieutenant of Company M, Sixth Regiment Illinois Cavalry Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4021) granting a pension to Abraham Cover, report:

That claimant enlisted in the military service of the United States as first lieutentant Company M, Sixth Illinois Cavalry Volunteers, January 9, 1862, and resigned Jannary 3, 1863, on surgeon's certificate of disability.

August 30, 1876, he filed a declaration for pension, alleging "chronic rheumatism and chronic nephritis, resulting in epilepsy, contracted during the winter of 1861 and 1862, while on the road between Camp Butler and Shawneetown, Ill.," which was rejected November 28, 1876, on the ground that the disability existed prior to service.

It is shown that soldier went into camp with his company October 20, 1861, but was not commissioned until January 9, 1862.

Capt. Isaiah M. Sperry, of Cobden, Ill., testifies March 31, 1882: That he was captain of claimant's company, which was enrolled October 12, 1861, and mustered January 9, 1862; that about December 1, 1861, claimant incurred an attack of rheumatism from exposure to rain and cold; was in hospital several weeks; again, about September 16, 1862, while in line of duty was attacked with rheumatism and sent to hospital at Cairo, Ill., where he remained until November, 1862; in December, 1862, from exposure to rain, was again attacked with rheumatism. Claimant remained with the company until it reached Holly Springs, Miss., when he was discharged on surgeon's certificate for rheumatism and nephritis; that soldier was sound at time of enlistment; that from the date of his discharge to present time claimant has been entirely unable to perform manual labor, from disease contracted in the Army.

Dr. A. G. Agnew, assistant surgeon of claimant's regiment, testifies March 31, 1882, that claimant came home on a sick leave of absence, suffering from rheumatism and nephritis. As soon as sufficiently recovered he returned to his command. In December, 1862, claimant was again attacked with above-named diseases, in consequence of exposure, and it became necessary for him to go home to save his life. Affiant was claimant's family physician before his enlistment, and the soldier was then a sound man.

Dr. James S. Whitmer, surgeon of claimant's regiment, testifies March 31, 1882, that claimant was attacked with acute rheumatism in December, 1861, on the march from Duquoin to Shawneetown, Ill., and was in the hospital about two months; during a part of the time affiant attended him.

R. Loomis, major of claimant's regiment, in accepting the resignation of the soldier, January 2, 1863, indorses on said resignation a statement that the disability existed before entering the service.

Dr. J. C. Allen, in an affidavit in his own handwriting, testifies March 31, 1882, that he knew claimant from 1853 to the time of his enlistment, and he was then well and hearty; that he was claimant's family physician from 1864 to April, 1873, during which time soldier was totally unable to perform any kind of manual labor, suffering from rheumatism and other diseases.

Dr. J. Bentley testifies, March 31, 1882, that he was claimant's family physician for nine years prior to his enlistment, and that he was a sound, healthy man at enlistment, free from all symptoms of rheumatism of the heart, or angina pectoris, with which he has suffered since his military service.

This medical testimony is substantially corroborated by that of Dr. James H. Hall.

A number of witnesses, all near neighbors and intimate associates of claimant prior to his enlistment, testify to his good health prior to and at the time of his enlistment.

The United States examining board at Carbondale, Jackson County, Illinois, examined claimant May 3, 1882, and report his disability at one-half.

Your committee are of the opinion that the soldier was free from disease at the time of his enlistment, and that his present disability is due to his military service, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES STOCKTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2377) granting a pension to James Stockton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of James Stockton, formerly of Company D, Thirty-first Regiment Missouri State Militia, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 2377, beg leave to submit the following report:

Your committee report that under the call of Hamilton R. Gamble, governor of Missouri, James Stockton organized Company D, Thirty-first Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, and that on the 19th day of September, 1861, said Stockton was commissioned and mustered in as captain of said company.

While in active service and on the 15th day of October, 1862, and in pursuit of a guerrilla band near Platte City, in Platte County, Missouri, the guerrillas turned and fired on said company, and at the flash of the guns the horse of Captain Stockton was killed, and in falling threw Stockton to the ground, injuring his arm so seriously that shortly thereafter it was amputated.

The only ground on which the Pension Bureau rejected the application of claimant is, to use the language of the Pension Commissioner, because "the claimant was not in the military service of the United States, the Thirty-first Enlisted Missouri Militia being a State organization, and therefore not pensionable under existing laws."

But said Stockton was acting under orders of officers in the Federal Army, and was co-operating with the troops of the United States in aiding to restore the supremacy of the Government, when he received the injury that resulted in the loss of his arm.

He is now perfectly impecunious and 85 years of age, and your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID WHITTINGTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6692) granting a pension to David Whittington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David Whittington, late a private in Company K, Sixtieth Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

That David Whittington enlisted in Company K, Sixtietn Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, August 10, 1862.

There is any quantity of evidence to the fact that prior and up to date of enlistment said Whittington was a hale, hearty, able-bodied man. That on or about the 1st day of February, 1863, near Germantown, Mo., and while in service, he was attacked by heart disease that so prostrated him he was unfit for duty, and on 21st of March, 1863, he was discharged from service on surgeon's certificate of disability. These facts are testified to by Jonathan Eskew, William Tuttle, and C. S. Tuttle. That from February, 1863, to present time he has almost all the time been disabled for labor one-half the time, and is now totally disabled for labor.

These facts are testified to by Dr. D. M. King, Dr. W. F. Baren, Dr. John Blockburn, Dr. A. H. May, D. C. Boyer, S. W. Calvert, and J. T. Vogan, some of whom lived in the same house, others at a distance of from one-fourth of a mile to five miles, and who saw and were in the company of said Whittington frequently every day. He is very poor, disabled from labor, and will be dependent on the charity of his neighbors if not relieved by the Government in whose service he incurred his disability. The only ground upon which the Pension Department rejected his claim is that the organization to which he belonged was not in regular United States service, and therefore not pensionable.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

CLARK G. MAINE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7000) for the relief of Clark G. Maine.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Clark G. Maine, late a private in Battery E, First New York Light Artillery.

The report (by Mr. BAGLEY) was read, as follows:

The basis of the petitioner's claim is that on the Weldon Railroad, Virginia, February 25, 1865, he was thrown from a horse, and sustained an injury to his right shoulder and side. The committee find from the claimant's affidavit that he was injured while riding toward City Point, Va., alone, about 10 o'clock at night; that he was ordered to go by a sergeant, and thinks none of his officers knew when he started or returned; that he does not know and can not learn the address of the sergeant who ordered him to go; that only Lieutenants Matherson and Humphrey were with the company at the time, and he is confident he saw neither of them; that Lieutenant Matherson has informed him that he can not recollect the facts definitely enough to testify, and that he has no other means of proving the facts except by his tent-mates, Seymour Lloyd and William E. Haskell.

The testimony of these two men, Haskell and Lloyd, who were tent-mates of claimant, is substantially as follows: That about March 1, 1865, in front of Petersburg, Va., in the night-time, petitioner was sent on horseback to ascertain the cause of artillery firing in the direction of City Point; saw the next day that his face and mouth were badly bruised, and complained of great injury to his right shoulder; stated the horse threw him, and struck or fell on him; the surgeon examined and directed him to go to the hospital, but he urged to be excused from the hospital, and was allowed to remain with the regiment. When he attempted to do anything requiring the use of his shoulder great pain was evident, and he was finally released from duty as No. 1 on the piece, and given charge of a team. His shoulder appeared to remain substantially the same until he was discharged.

James H. Graham, another comrade, testifies same as Haskell and Lloyd.

To show the continuance of the disability, Seymour Lloyd says, under oath, dated December 3, 1883, that after discharge he worked for claimant frequently for several years, and also worked with him; that claimant could not do heavy work that required a strain on his shoulder, and in his opinion he was disabled from the performance of manual labor one-half by reason of the injury.

Elbridge G. Seymour, M. D., testifies, April 19, 1883, that claimant called on him in July, 1865, for advice and surgical treatment of right shoulder joint. On elevation of arm distinct crepitus could be felt and heard at quite a distance, crepitus being in the shoulder-joint; felt most distinctly on upper anterior surface, giving a feeling of loose cartilage. Came to affiant's office at different times, with only temporary relief.

David S. Sayles testifies, April 19, 1883, that after claimant's discharge from the Army in 1865 he was very lame in his right shoulder. Lived near, and labored with, for, and on lands adjoining claimant the greater part of thirteen years. That during all that time claimant was lame and showed great suffering from injury to right shoulder. Thinks the labor done with the right arm for fourteen years was with great pain and suffering. Mary Lizzy Maine, who is not related to petitioner, corroborates and indorses the affidavit of Sayles.

Benjamin F. Dump, examining surgeon, says he finds the applicant in good physical condition, except the results of a fracture of the right scapula, involving all the scapula above the spine. There is strongly-marked crepitus upon rotation or any motion of the head of the humerus. Injury said by claimant to have been caused by the fall of his horse. The action and usefulness of the shoulder greatly impaired. Fully three-fourths disability.

The claimant's service was as a private in Company E, First New York State Artillery, in which he enlisted August 31, 1864, and from which he was discharged June 16, 1865. Declaration for pension was filed June 30, 1880, and rejected on the ground of claimant's inability to furnish any satisfactory evidence that injury was received in line of duty.

The committee, however, believe the statements made, and that the claimant is justly entitled to a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object to the passage of this bill. I do not think it is good policy for the House to pass bills which have been rejected by the Pension Bureau, not on account of any technical objection, but upon the ground that the evidence failed to sustain the application. Now, here is a claim for a pension which was not filed nor the claim made until about eighteen years after the close of the war. That very fact, the long delay in applying for a pension, while it is not conclusive, and I do not pretend to say that it is, nevertheless it is presumptive evidence at least against the fact that he was injured or had a pensionable disability at the time he was discharged from the service. I am aware there are many good men and good soldiers who have had pensionable disabilities at the time of their discharge who probably have not yet applied for a pension, but there are not many of them.

There is another fact connected with this case, and it is this: This soldier says he was sent by an order from his sergeant after night from Petersburg to some point in Virginia near there, and that in making that ride his horse fell and he was injured in the shoulder, but he says that he can not remember the name of the sergeant. The sergeant of his company gives him an order, and yet he says he can not remember the name of that sergeant!

Mr. BAGLEY. Let me correct the gentleman from Alabama. What he said was that he could not learn the address of the sergeant who had ordered him to make that night ride.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Now let us see about that.

Mr. BAGLEY. You are mistaken about his not remembering the the name of the sergeant.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. He said that he can not remember the address. Well, he ought to have at least given the name of the sergeant, which is part of the address. The address is the name and the place of residence of the sergeant. So I was correct in my statement, as the report shows.

He says another thing, or at least this report states, that he did not believe that any of his officers knew of his being sent out.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. They did not know when he went or when he returned.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Ah! The order, if issued regularly, would have to pass through these officers. It is therefore a strange thing to me that his officers did not know within a few hours or at least within a day of the time when he returned. If he was injured they must have known of it. It must have been reported to them.

Mr. MATSON. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. With pleasure.

Mr. MATSON. Does the gentleman intend to insist upon his objection to this case?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I do.

Mr. MATSON. Then I ask by unanimous consent that the case be informally passed over.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

JOHN F. CHASE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6904) for the relief of John F. Chase.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John F. Chase, formerly a member of Company B, Eighteenth Regiment New York State Infantry Volunteers.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The petitioner was mustered into the service of the United States on May 17, 1861, and discharged July 12, 1861. His service was that of a private in Company B, Eighteenth Regiment New York Volunteers. Declaration for pension made March 20, 1879, and the basis of the claim is as follows:

"At Jersey City, N. J., about May 10, 1861, was ruptured in the right groin, caused by removing baggage from steamer to railroad, under orders of his captain."

In another declaration, made November 18, 1879, he says that about May 15, 1861, in lifting a large trunk, slipped and fell, causing a severe rupture.

Claim was rejected on the ground of claimant's inability to show the incurrence of rupture of the right side in the service and the line of duty.

Certificate of disability for discharge shows that claimant was discharged on the 12th day of July, 1861, at Washington, D. C., because of scrotal hernia of the right side, caused by extra exertion, on the 19th June, 1861. Certificate is signed by W. A. Jackson, colonel commanding the Eighteenth Regiment New York Volunteers, and is approved by A. N. McLaven, surgeon, United States Army, and medical director.

Claimant, in his affidavit filed May 4, 1881, says that while at Jersey City, en route for Washington, was injured in the following manner: He was ordered by an officer of his company to lift a large, heavy trunk from the barge to the dock; at that moment a steamer commenced moving off, causing the barge to rock, and throwing him off his balance; felt a severe strain in his right side as of something giving way, and he let the trunk fall and fell forward on its corner, injuring himself just above the right groin. When the regiment arrived at Meridian Hill, District of Columbia, he called on Surgeon Van Ingen, who examined him and pronounced it scrotal hernia. The surgeon told him, as the regiment was about to move, that he could go to hospital or be discharged, and he accepted the latter. After discharge he returned to his home, and in a few days called on Dr. Chambers, who advised him what kind of a truss to get. Dr. Chambers has since died. Claimant also swears that he has been unable to procure the testimony of an officer of his regiment as to incurrence of injury for the reason that the colonel and surgeon are dead. Other officers he has been unable to find and others do not remember circumstances.

Abram D. Fox and Charles C. Philips testify that they were boys with claimant, and frequently went in bathing, and know claimant was sound at enlistment. In addition to the above, Fox testifies that he saw claimant about a week after his discharge; he was then weak and emaciated, and complained of pain in his groin, and in walking put his hand on his bowels on his right side, and walked in a stooping position. Was not able to perform any labor for five or six months, and afterward but very light labor.

Robert B. Whitlock says he and claimant were drafted into the service during the year 1863, and were examined at Schenectady, N. Y., and affiant was present when claimant was rejected on the ground of being ruptured. Claimant then stated that he was ruptured while in the service of the Government.

The claimant is unable to furnish any affidavits of officers or comrades, which is, of course, unfortunate; but his own affidavit bears upon it the impress of truth, and his reputation is good in the community in which he lives. His prior soundness is supported by testimony of those who always knew him, and his debilitated condition immediately after his return from the Army are facts indicating disability received while in the service.

The committee think him entitled to a pension, and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I have not had an opportunity to read the report, but I wish to ask the gentleman who reported the bill whether he favors the pension upon the unsupported affidavit of this soldier? I would infer so.

Mr. BAGLEY. The certificate of disability shows he was injured and the character of his injury. It is signed by W. A. Jackson, colonel commanding, and is approved by A. N. McLaven, surgeon United States Army. It was on that ground the favorable report was made, and that is good evidence.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Did he file an affidavit for a pension at the bureau?

Mr. BAGLEY. He did, but his claim was rejected, as he was unable to prove the rupture.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Does the discharge show that he was injured?

Mr. BAGLEY. It does; and it is signed, as I have already stated, by Colonel Jackson, the colonel commanding the regiment.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

MARY MULHOLLAND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3355) for the relief of Mary Mulholland.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the certificate of pension heretofore granted Mary Mulholland, No. 193403, dated September 19, 1881, be, and the same is hereby, approved and confirmed; and the Commissioner of Pensions is authorized and directed to restore the said Mary Mulholland to the pension-roll, and to pay her all arrearages of pension that have been heretofore withheld.

The amendment reported by the committee is as follows:

Strike out and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll the name of Mary Mulholland, under certificate No. 193403.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) was read, as follows:

Mary Mulholland is the stepmother of Robert Mulholland, of the One hundred and eighty-third Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and had the entire care, custody, and control of said Robert from his infancy, and supported him, by her own hard labor, until he was grown to manhood, when he became her sole support until and at the time he enlisted in the Army, and thereafter until he was taken prisoner at Franklin, Tenn., and died in prison at Andersonville, Ga. She applied for a pension, which was granted to her, as the mother of said Robert, to whom she had always sustained that relation, and in the belief that she was entitled to such pension as the mother of said Robert. Her claim to pension was allowed and a certificate therefor was issued, but before it was delivered to her, the fact that she was a stepmother becoming known, the certificate was withheld.

That the claimant was dependent upon her own labor after the death of her husband, the soldier's father, in 1852; and that the stepson, as soon as he became old enough to earn a living, did aid very materially in the support of his stepmother, was clearly shown by the evidence originally in the case, and fully confirmed by the testimony taken by the special examiner in 1882.

The general pension laws, although providing for pension in case of mothers and other near relatives, who were dependent upon a soldier, exclude stepmothers, no matter how much they may have been dependent upon a soldier stepson, and therefore the action of the Pension Office in refusing a pension to the claimant was proper. But your committee are of opinion that in cases like the one under consideration the relief denied by the general law should be granted, and therefore report favorably on the bill, amended, however, by striking out all after the word "assembled," in line 2, and insert therein instead the following words: "That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-rolls the name of Mary Mulholland, under certificate 193403," and thus amended ask that it do pass.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHRISTIANA ALMIER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2538) granting a pension to Christiana Almier.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Christiana Eldermeier, mother of Frederick Eldermeier, deceased, late a member of Company I, Forty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) is as follows:

The committee find that Christiana Almier is the mother of Frederick Almier, who was a private soldier in Company I, Forty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and died January 17, 1875. The claim for pension in this case is "gunshot wound in right knee, received at the battle of Chickamauga, Ga., on September 19, 1863, and was finally discharged from the service June 29, 1864, by reason of said wounds."

The claim was rejected by the Pension Department on the ground that the soldier's death was not the result of gunshot wound for which he was pensioned, as alleged. The testimony is clear in this case that Frederick Almier was disabled to a pensionable degree, and as long as he lived he received a pension of $4 a month. Frederick Almier enlisted August 26, 1861, and was discharged from the service June 29, 1864, by reason of wound received as stated.

The question is, did Frederick Almier die from the effects of the wound of knee received at Chickamauga, Ga.? The following affidavit of Dr. Anton Shiebenzuber, of Dayton, Ohio, made July 31, 1880, reads as follows:

"I am a practicing physician, and have been for fifteen years, and was well acquainted with Frederick Almier, late a private in Company I, of the Forty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry. I attended him four months previous to his death, and found him suffering from disease of the spinal cord, caused by a gunshot wound through the right knee, effecting destruction of the nervus cruralis, and in consequence of the constant irritation of the scar a chronic inflammation of this nerve and finally of the spinal cord, ending in the destruction of the vitality of this cord, and was, in my opinion, the only and last cause of the death of said Frederick Almier. I have no interest in the case, and am not concerned in its prosecution."

Christiana Almier has made several affidavits to the effect that her son was a strong, healthy man previous to enlistment, and there was no evidence of any other trouble, except his wound, at the time of his death. She is corroborated by many witnesses as to his condition previous to enlistment, and several express the non-professional opinion that nothing else could have been the matter at the time of his death but the wound received while in the service of the United States. Dr. Anton Shiebenzuber is vouched for as being a man of excellent professional standing and personal reliability. Frederick W. Beck, on the 18th day of August, 1882, made affidavit as follows:

"In my business of undertaker I laid out the body of Frederick Almier preparatory to burial, and found that the right leg at the knee was very much swollen and of black and blue color. Further than that at this time the attending physician, Dr. Anton Shiebenzuber, said to me that the death of said Almier was caused by a gunshot wound of the knee received while in the service of the United States."

The testimony is clear that the claimant was entirely dependent upon her son for support, and is now very poor. There is no testimony to contradict the testimony of Dr. Anton Shiebenzuber, and all testimony is favorable to the claimant. The last examination of surgeons certifies that—

"Frederick Almier is totally disabled. Inflammation exists, with periodical swelling and constant pain, together with weakness of knee-joint, rendering him unable to perform manual labor."

Your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, with the following amendments:

In lines 6 and 7 strike out the name "Eldromeir" and insert "Almier."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Christiana Almier."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman who reports this bill whether or not this soldier left a widow.

Mr. LE FEVRE. No, sir; he did not. It is his mother who seeks the relief here. There is no question on that point at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments recommended by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALONZO CORNWELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7046) granting a pension to Alonzo Cornwell.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alonzo Cornwell, late a private in Company F, Sixty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) is as follows:

Your committee, having examined the evidence in above case, respectfully report that Alonzo Cornwell enlisted in Company F, Sixty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, October 27, 1861, and was discharged July 21, 1862, on surgeon's certificate of general debility of three months' duration, following typhoid fever, "with no prospect of recovery."

The claim for pension in this case is—

"That on or about February 15, 1862, while on the march up the Shenandoah Valley, Virginia, he was disabled by reason of ruptured veins of both legs below the knees; also by exposure and wading the Little Cacapon River, Virginia, he contracted rheumatism and chronic diarrhea, from which he has ever since been disabled."

The claim was rejected by the Pension Department on the ground that "no disability from alleged causes exists."

After examining the testimony carefully your committee is at a loss to understand how the department arrived at the conclusion that no disability exists.

Mrs. Elizabeth Cornwell, of Toledo, Ohio, May 22, 1882, testified as follows:

"I have been well and intimately acquainted with claimant for the past fifty-eight years. I well know that at the date of his enlistment he was a sound and healthy man, and free from varicose veins, rheumatism, and diarrhea; did all kinds of manual labor. I raised the claimant from a mere child to manhood."

Mrs. Harriet J. Johnson, of Toledo, Ohio, November 29, testified:

"I knew the claimant for about fifteen years prior to his enlistment; he worked for me and I paid him $20 per month, and I know that at the date of his enlistment he was a sound and hearty man."

Dewitt C. Dewey, of Toledo, Ohio, November 29, 1882, testified:

"For ten or fifteen years prior to his enlistment the claimant was a near neighbor of mine. I saw him very often, and considered him a sound, hearty man, free from the diseases for which he claims pension."

The same witness, Dewitt C. Dewey, in another affidavit, testifies:

"I know from personal observation, being captain of Company E, Sixty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, that while the claimant was a member of said company, and in line of duty on a forced march from Pawpaw Tunnel and Winchester, he had to ford with the regiment the Little Cacapon River, and in consequence of his being heated at the time and immersion in cold water, I believe he contracted rheumatism and varicose veins, because he was unable to march farther, and was conveyed to a hospital at Cumberland, Md., and remained there one month, after which he was sent to Mount Pleasant Hospital, Washington, D. C. About June 19, 1862, I observed varicose veins on his legs before he was transferred to the Mount Pleasant Hospital."

The above witness is vouched for as reliable and worthy of credit.

Two more reliable witnesses testify to claimant's soundness prior to enlistment. S. F. Forbes, surgeon of the Sixty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, states that claimant has bad varicose veins, but can not swear that the trouble was contracted while in the service. W. H. Kief, captain in the Sixty-seventh Ohio Volunteer Infantry, in an affidavit made May 22, 1882, corroborates the testimony of Captain Dewitt C. Dewey.

Harriet J. Johnston, Dewitt C. Dewey, and Elizabeth Cornwell all testify to the existence of rheumatism and varicose veins ever since claimant's discharge from the Army.

Examining Surgeons J. S. Beck, J. M. Weaver, and A. S. Dunlap certify under date of January 23, 1884:

"The deep veins on both legs from knees to feet are very considerably enlarged. The internal saphenous vein has been ruptured, as indicated by a deep purple tint; rate, three-quarters, $6. Says he has no chronic diarrhea now; has had none since the summer of 1865."

The testimony as quoted seems to your committee sufficient to establish the claimant's case. The testimony is abundant as to his having been a sound man previous to enlistment. The witnesses to his disability (having originated while in the service) are not numerous, but very respectable and worthy of credit, while the testimony of his helplessness from date of discharge to the present time is perfectly conclusive.

Therefore your committee without hesitation recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman reporting this bill when the application for a pension in this case was filed in the Pension Bureau?

Mr. LE FEVRE. I do not remember; perhaps my colleague [Mr. MURRAY] can give you the information.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to know if it is of recent date?

Mr. MURRAY. It is of old standing. I can not give the exact date.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman making the report another question, whether these affidavits are ex parte, or whether the testimony was taken before a special examiner?

Mr. LE FEVRE. Part of it was taken before a special examiner and part of it ex parte testimony.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Then they are mere ex parte affidavits. Was any new testimony or any additional testimony taken before the committee that was not before the examiners of the Pension Bureau?

Mr. LE FEVRE. Mr. Chairman, these affidavits were taken in the usual way, as all the affidavits that are filed in the Pension Office are taken. There is no difference in that respect between this case and all other cases filed in that office.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. This case, I suppose then, was rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that the proof did not support the allegations in the claim, and this is simply an appeal from the Pension Bureau to Congress. That being the case, if we pass this bill it is a reversal simply of the decision of the examiners in the Pension Bureau. It amounts to that and that only.

Mr. MURRAY. I would like to state, by way of explanation, that notwithstanding the decision of the Pension Department, the examining surgeons, Weaver and Beck, of Dayton, testify that the disability on the part of this claimant is fully three-fourths, and reputable witnesses have testified that the disease from which he suffers did not exist until after he went into the service. They are very reliable witnesses.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows of his own personal knowledge as to their reputation?

Mr. MURRAY. I know the person who makes the claim and many of the witnesses; not all of them.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN HAZLEWOOD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6596) granting a pension to John Hazlewood.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Hazlewood, late a private in Company F, Seventh Regiment West Virginia Cavalry.

The report by (Mr. LE FEVRE) is as follows:

Your committee, having carefully considered this case, find that John Hazlewood enlisted in Company F, Seventh Regiment of West Virginia Cavalry, September 17, 1861, and was discharged from the service January 26, 1865. The claim for pension is that he "contracted piles at New Creek, Va., about May 15, 1862, and asthma at Culpeper, Va., about July 20, 1862."

The claim was rejected by the Pension Department on the ground of "inability to furnish medical evidence to show condition in the service or at date of discharge." It is true that he has been unable to furnish medical evidence of treatment for his disabilities while in the Army, because his regimental surgeon, Dr. James Putney, who treated him, has no record of said treatment, and can not remember the facts, but he does state the following, which dates the existence of the disease for which claimant asks for pension to within six months of the date of the discharge:

"Mr. John Hazlewood presented himself to me for medical treatment in July, 1865. I diagnosed his disease 'humoral asthma;' he had been but recently discharged from the United States service, and informed me, upon inquiry, that he had been affected for several months; that he had contracted the disease while in the service. I had no doubt as to the truth of his statement, as the disease appeared to be chronic, which has proven to be so, not having yielded to any treatment from that time to the present (February 12, 1878). He tells me that I ought to be able to state that he was sound when he entered the service; that I knew him before the war. Perhaps I did, but I can not remember him prior to July, 1865. I have treated him several times since then."

Thomas Martin, Joseph Quenby, and Darius Henry, all neighbors, testify under oath that John Hazlewood was a sound and able-bodied man prior to and at the date of enlistment. John McComb, late first lieutenant of the claimant's company, under oath, May 29, 1876, says:

"Claimant contracted asthma at or near Culpeper, Va., about the middle of July, 1862, and frequently complained of being unwell."

Fletcher C. Lanham, second lieutenant of claimant's company, under oath, November 5, 1875, testifies that claimant—

"Contracted piles near New Creek, Va., in May, 1862, and asthma in July, 1862."

Thomas J. Tucker, corporal in claimant's company, says that—

"Claimant contracted piles at or near New Creek, Va., about the middle of May, 1862, and asthma in July, 1862."

Robert W. Jones, first sergeant of claimant's company, under oath, November 15, 1877, says:

"Claimant contracted piles at or near New Castle, Va., and asthma at Culpeper, Va., in the year 1862."

Thomas Martin, Dr. A. L. Knight, Darius Henry, and Joseph Quenby, in separate affidavits, all testify that claimant has suffered from asthma and piles ever since he came home from the Army.

The examining surgeon says:

"Hemorrhoids are found protruding from anus in masses equal in the aggregate to the size of a hen-egg, and presenting the appearance of a ripe raw tomato. The evidences of asthma are well marked, the breathing being labored and accompanied by moist râles. I rate the piles as disabling him one-half total, the asthma as disabling him one-half total."

In view of the fact that three neighbors testify to the complete soundness of the claimant previous to enlistment, the first lieutenant, second lieutenant, first sergeant, and a corporal all swearing to the fact that the diseases from which the claimant suffers were contracted while in the Army, with time and place stated; the surgeon, six months after discharge of the claimant, testifying to the existence of the disease in a chronic form, and four neighbors swearing to the existence of the disease from the time of leaving the service to the present time, ought to be, in the judgment of your committee, sufficient to overcome the fact that the claimant has been unable to furnish medical testimony of the existence of disability while in the service, and your committee recommend the passage or the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

R. D. LAWRENCE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6196) granting a pension to R. D. Lawrence.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of R. D. Lawrence, late a private in Company E, First Regiment Michigan Light Artillery, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) is as follows:

Your committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 6196, respectfully report that R. D. Lawrence was a private soldier in Company E, First Regiment Michigan Light Artillery. He enlisted December 24, 1863, and was discharged May 20, 1865. The basis of his claim for pension is that he was attacked by lumbago and piles while at Nashville, Tenn. After the original declaration was made he stated that he did not intend to apply for pension on account of lumbago, but that he had the disease and was much distressed in the back on entering the hospital, but when the piles appeared and bled the lumbago disappeared. The claim was rejected by the Pension Department on the ground that—

"There is no record of piles, and claimant's inability to furnish satisfactory testimony connecting said disease with the service."

The report of the Adjutant-General shows that the claimant was in hospital three times in the year 1864, but does not state with what disease he was afflicted, but the report shows that he was in hospital most of the time after first admission, in 1864, to May 20, 1865.

Sanford Birtz, a comrade, testifies to claimant's soundness prior to enlistment. He is unable to furnish the testimony of a commissioned officer as to the origin of his disability while in the service, but he does furnish the testimony of Surgeon Myers, who was in charge of post hospital, Nashville, Tenn., to the effect that—

"Claimant had charge of the linen-room of said hospital, and conducted his duty as faithfully as his condition would permit, as during that time he was suffering from lumbago, from which he had not recovered at the date of his discharge."

John H. Evans swears, July 21, 1882—

"That he is well acquainted with the claimant, and in 1866 he came to his brother's house quite sick with piles, for which he was attended by Dr. Hycoff for some time, and then went to Buffalo general hospital, and was still suffering from the same disease when he left the hospital. Was a great sufferer from piles while he knew him in 1866."

The standing of this witness is good.

The claimant has been unable to furnish medical testimony showing continuance of the disease from 1866 because his parents are dead, as is also his family physician. August Mellon testifies that he has been acquainted with the claimant during the past sixteen years, and swears that he has been afflicted with piles during the whole time. Dr. J. L. Bicknell, superintendent of the Buffalo general hospital, furnishes a certificate, dated March 26, 1879, in which he says:

"According to our hospital record, R. D. Lawrence entered the Buffalo general hospital April 18, 1866, was treated for triple lesions and for hemorrhoids, and was honorably discharged May 15, 1866. He again entered the hospital August 20, 1867, and was discharged the 27th of the same month. Treated for hemorrhoids."

The surgeon at the hospital at the National Military Home, Dayton, Ohio, says that the claimant was admitted for treatment August 30, 1867.

The examining surgeons, Drs. J. S. Beck, H. S. Jewett, and A. S. Dunlap, at Dayton, Ohio, December 29, 1880, report that—"He has hemorrhoids external; they come down very badly and bleed profusely at times. They are now down, forming an external tumor about the size of a walnut. There are now also two small fistulous openings that discharge slightly."

There seems to be no room for doubt but that the claimant has been a constant sufferer from the time of his being in the service down to the present time with the disease for which he claims a pension, and your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this is another case that has been rejected by the Pension Bureau upon the ground that the testimony which was filed there did not support the allegations of the petition, and there is nothing in the report to show that any additional testimony was brought before the committee of this House.

It seems from this report that this soldier was considerable of a "hospital rat," and that he had spent most of his time in the hospitals. We all know that this class of soldiers was not the best in the world, and I think we had better pass this over.

Mr. BAGLEY. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama in reference to this and the preceding case to which objection was made by the office, I wish to state that every case that comes down to the Committee on Invalid Pensions is a case that has been rejected by the Pension Office. We do not pretend to examine a case unless it has been rejected. Therefore the claim that he makes against this case and the preceding one is not good. If it was a good case, or if the proof complied with the technical requirements of the law, it would not come to us at all. It comes to us simply because of the fact that there is some little discrepancy in the case or in the evidence whereby the law does not reach it—some technical defect perhaps in the proof which does not allow it to come strictly within the provisions of the law so as to be allowed by the Department; and it comes here upon its equities for us to do justice to the man on the merits of the claim irrespective of the technicalities of the law. And the gentleman from Alabama must remember that these cases must be rejected by the office before the Committee on Invalid Pensions could take any control of them or have any cognizance whatever of them.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If Congress is to investigate all these cases that have been rejected by the Pension Bureau, it will take pretty much all the time of Congress to do it. We have seen proper and I think very wisely to create a bureau with officers and with capable men to examine into all these claims for pensions upon the facts that are presented; and I believe, sir, that they are better capable of judging of the facts submitted—I mean they have a better opportunity of judging—I do not mean to say they are abler men or more capable of judging of the effect or of the weight of evidence than members of the House; but I say they have a better opportunity to do it than we have, a better opportunity than the House can possibly have or any member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions or of the Committee on Pensions or of any other committee of this House.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I am always ready to yield with pleasure to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. What the gentleman states is very true as to the law of the case. But the Pension Office has not the power of examining into the equities of a case unless they are covered by the law.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I am not speaking now of cases that present equities. There are cases that come from the Pension Bureau here that are proper cases for us to consider. Those are cases that are rejected there on technical grounds; not on the ground that the evidence does not support the application, not on the ground that the man did not contract the disease or receive the wound in the service; but on some technical ground as to the bar of the statute of limitation or something of that sort. Such a case presents an equity, and the House ought to hear it.

But this is a mere appeal presenting no equities. It is only a question as to whether this soldier contracted in the service the disease which disables him; and that is a question which I say the bureau which we have established here can better inquire into than any committee of this House or any member of it. And when the claim is rejected upon the merits by the Pension Bureau I contend that that ought to be an end of it; because if all those cases which have been rejected upon the merits are to come here, there will be no end to your special legislation upon these pension claims. At the same time I think it is right and proper that where a claim is rejected not upon its merits but upon some technical ground then the House ought to take jurisdiction, and if it presents a meritorious case that the House ought to pass the bill.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I examined this case very carefully. It is true there was not much testimony showing that the claimant was disabled in the service simply because he had no hospital record. But the testimony is clear, dating from early in the year 1866, that he was afflicted with the disability for which he claims a pension, and from that time down to the date of the filing or rejection of his claim there is no question of the existence of the disability. It seemed to me to be a clear case that this man was entitled to a pension, though he was unable to furnish the technical evidence that was required by the Department.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The only evidence required by the Department is not technical. All the Department asks for is satisfactory evidence that the soldier had received his disability in the line of duty and in the service; and when that is proven, when that is satisfactorily proven, it is the duty of the Pension Bureau to grant a pension.

Mr. BAGLEY. May I ask the gentleman from Alabama one question?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAGLEY. Is the gentleman from Alabama not aware of this fact, that frequently cases are sent here to the Committee on Invalid Pensions for consideration or adjudication that have been rejected by the Pension Office, with the recommendation that a bill be passed for the relief of the claimant.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Yes, sir; and every one of those cases has been rejected on some technical ground. They are never sent here when they are tried upon their merits; when the Pension Bureau has full jurisdiction to try a case upon its merits, and when it has tried it upon its merits and rejected it upon its merits. It is only in those cases where the claim has been rejected upon some technical ground that there is any such recommendation as the gentleman from New York alludes to.

Mr. MATSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I will hear the question with pleasure.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman from Alabama states to the House that the Pension Office only requires satisfactory evidence of the allegations filed with the claim. I wish to ask him if he does not know that two kinds of evidence are required, the evidence of the comrades of the soldier and then the evidence of medical treatment in the service or immediately after the discharge; and that sometimes that kind of evidence is very difficult to obtain? Does the gentleman not know that we have acted upon such cases repeatedly? I may ask, making the question broader than that, if he does not know in his experience in Congress, covering ten years I believe, whether during that time it has not been the habit of the House to act upon cases of that kind where the only question turned upon the merits of the case because of the man's failure to produce certain kinds of proof required by the law?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I answer my friend from Indiana by saying that the Pension Bureau requires medical evidence of a disability in the service where it can be furnished or satisfactory reasons showing why it can not be furnished. I admit that we have been here for years taking up cases that are mere appeals from the Pension Bureau to the House upon the merits of the cases involved. I think we have been doing that ever since I have been in Congress. But it is a bad practice, and I think it is time to quit it. It is never too late to stop doing wrong.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] to the fact that this case has been rejected at the Pension Office for a technical reason—the want of medical testimony as to the treatment of this man in the hospital for hemorrhoids and lumbago. That this man was in the hospital repeatedly, and for a considerable length of time with some disease, there is no doubt. From his own testimony there is no doubt that he was suffering from lumbago and hemorrhoids; but upon the hospital records it is not shown that he was treated for hemorrhoids, and for this reason, as the disability for which he claims a pension is hemorrhoids, this case was rejected.

Now that is a purely technical rejection. It is not denied that he was sick; it is not denied that he was in the hospital. The proof is here—competent proof that would be good in any court of record anywhere under heaven—that this man had hemorrhoids, that he contracted this disease in the Army, suffered from it after his discharge, and has suffered from it ever since. The bare technical reason for the rejection of his claim in the Pension Office is that there is no written record of his having been treated for this disease while in the service. The surgeon of the hospital neglected to do his duty and make a written record that this man was suffering from hemorrhoids and was treated for that disease in the hospital.

Right here I want to make a remark or two in regard to these rejections of claims at the Pension Office. We talk a great deal here as though these rejections were made by the Commissioner in person or by some officer high in authority, when the simple truth is that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the Commissioner never knows anything about these rejected cases or the reasons for which they are rejected.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Does not the law allow in every case where a case is rejected an appeal——

Mr. CUTCHEON. Yes, sir; and an appeal to the Commissioner of Pensions and an appeal to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. FUNSTON. And an appeal to Congress.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Yes; and an appeal to Congress. But there is nothing in this case, there is nothing in any of these cases we have been considering, from which it appears that the case ever went beyond the examiner. The cases as a rule go simply to an examiner in the Pension Bureau. These examiners are not men of legal learning; they are not accustomed by previous training to weighing evidence and determining questions of law. They are simply clerks; that is all; and I undertake to say from my experience and observation that many of them are more anxious to run through a list of cases and make a record upon the number of cases they submit than they are to do justice to the claimants.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Is it not true also that they are advanced on account of——

Mr. CUTCHEON. On account of the number of cases they submit.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. And the objections they find to claims.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Yes, sir. The result is, as I said, that many of these examiners, I fear, are more anxious to "skin the files," as they call it, picking out the easy cases and running them through, and thus "making a record" for themselves, than they are to do justice to claimants.

I want to say that I have a great deal of confidence in these fifteen gentlemen constituting the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I believe they are equal in soundness of judgment not only to any one examiner of the Pension Office, but to any fifteen examiners, and equal in soundness of judgment to any board of review in the Pension Office. Now, when a case comes from this committee with a favorable recommendation, that recommendation is sufficient in any ordinary case to satisfy me that the bill should have the approval of this House.

In this case the objection of the gentleman from Alabama has no force. This is not an appeal simply upon the weight of evidence; it is an appeal "upon a technical ground." This case was rejected at the Pension Office for want of medical evidence of the treatment of this man in the hospital for hemorrhoids. The evidence is submitted here. It is competent evidence, although not technical medical evidence. In other words, it is not "record evidence." It is not written in the hospital register by the surgeon in charge that this man was treated for hemorrhoids. Yet there does not remain in your mind, Mr. Chairman, or in my mind, or in the mind of any gentleman on this floor, a doubt that this man was in the hospital with hemorrhoids, was treated for that disease, and that the surgeon in charge, whoever he may have been, failed to do his duty in making the necessary report. That wrong we are here to right. That wrong I hope we shall right, and right it speedily.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry to hear the serious charges made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] against the examiners in the Pension Bureau. I had hoped that when Mr. Cleveland shall come into office these men, under the civil-service regulations, might be continued in office; but if they have been doing as the gentleman from Michigan states, they ought to be turned out and better men put in their places. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. Some of them.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Now, I am sorry indeed to hear that under the Republican administration of the Pension Bureau men are there who in order to make a record of running through a great many cases reject meritorious pension claims.

I have confidence that when a change of administration takes place in that Pension Bureau all these men, if these charges be true, will then under the civil-service law be turned out and men put in their places who will do the soldiers of this country justice; who will give to every soldier who has a meritorious claim proper consideration; who will carefully examine to see whether a case is meritorious and the party entitled to a pension under the law.

Mr. Chairman, in all the charges which have been brought against the Republican party and its administration I have never heard a more serious one than that which has been made here to-night by the gentleman from Michigan, that the professed friends of the Union soldier who have had the administration of this Pension Bureau so long have done as he has indicated. It must be that he is in error; for I think that if such had been the case and the gentleman from Michigan had known of it he would have brought the fact to the notice of the Executive, who had the power to remove these unfaithful—I would say wicked servants, who would do such gross injustice to the soldiers of this country.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I desire not to take up the time of this committee by prolonging this discussion, because we can do much more good by continuing the work of passing bills and relieving much distress. If I had supposed I would open the flood-gates of party harangue by reference to the fact that not every one of the 1,500 clerks engaged in the Pension Office is always faithful to the dictates of patriotism and reason I would have made no such allusion. I merely stated that in my examination of the files I had been led to believe that some of these examiners did neglect cases in order to make a record and secure promotion. I trust if any of these men are caught at it either the present administration or the succeeding one will find better or more faithful men for their places. I beg my friend from Alabama to remember that in the civil-service organization of the last two years quite a number of Democrats have stolen into places in this Pension Bureau, and that will probably explain the fact there are some unfaithful men there. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The gentleman from Michigan is correct, for if any Democrats have gotten in there they must have stolen their way into the Pension Bureau. [Laughter and applause.] I do not know but it is the only thing a Democrat would steal. [Renewed laughter.] It is probably about all they will have the opportunity to steal when your party goes out of office. [Laughter and applause.]

I do not know, sir, but there will be some benefit from turning this session into a kind of experience meeting in regard to our efforts to secure for pensioners substantial justice from the Pension Department. It may be that the laws are too rigid, that the requirements in the collection of claims are too severe, but in the operations of the law as administered by that department I have myself found many instances where the barrier set up against the collection of claims against the Government resulted in the most flagrant wrong to claimants, whereby justice had been so long delayed that before they received the slightest benefit at the hands of the Government which they had helped to save great suffering resulted to them and their families.

I hold in my hand a paper received to-day in regard to a man who has been an applicant for a pension in consequence of injuries received in the service prior to 1860—an application which has gone through all the various rounds of rejection, having the rejection set aside and new testimony offered, &c. I have followed it up regularly for the reason that the poor, unfortunate fellow is blind; has a wife and children living in a cellar in Oak street, in Kansas City. I went to the department recently and appealed to them to try to do something for this poor fellow, who has been seeking a pension for years. He had forwarded the testimony of his comrades and others concerning the origin of his disability and its continuance, ample, I think, to have satisfied a court. It may be he did not comply with some technical rule, but I would give any officer more credit for integrity who would ignore rules in the interest of substantial justice to a man who is suffering as this poor fellow is. Let me read the letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 7, 1885.

SIR: In answer to your personal inquiry of recent date, I have the honor to state that it has been found necessary to have pension claim No. 20971 of John Tobin further examined in Salt Lake County, Utah, the first examination not containing evidence sufficient to fairly and intelligently adjudicate the claim.

This is to be regretted, but as soon as examiner is located in that district the papers will be forwarded to him and the examination of this claim will be made without any unnecessary delay.

Very respectfully, O. P. G. CLARKE, Commissioner.

Hon. J. J. O'NEILL,
House of Representatives.

After a delay of years it is now referred to a blank district without a commissioner whose appointment and consideration of the papers remain a conundrum for the future. What a beautiful example of circumlocution!

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. And this, sir, too, after many years of effort to complete the case.

I will hear the question of the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I only wanted to ask what is the number of the report in your case.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. My dear sir, I am replying to the speech of the gentleman from Alabama in connection with the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan. It is in that spirit I am replying. I do not choose to find fault with the officers of the department; but if they find that public sentiment and public opinion do not indorse their cold-blooded construction of rules and demand a little more heart and soul in the settlement of these claims, you would have fewer cases here to be subjected to criticism and discussion both in the committees and in this House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, a few words in reference to the question of evidence in the settlement of these claims pending before the House. I agree to a certain extent with the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama, that in general cases coming here should be limited to those where there are technical difficulties in the Pension Office in the application of the law which prevent the granting of the claim. But it should not be forgotten that in a case like this now before us in the Pension Office the claimant must prove in the first place that his disability was incurred in the service at a particular time and under particular circumstances, and also that it has continued as a disability down to the date of the application, connecting his present disability all the way back to the service, and then if his claim is allowed it carries arrears with it.

I am in favor myself of a regulation, or rather of a relaxation, of the rules of evidence in cases where arrears are not granted, as in special acts of Congress. If the claim does not carry arrears it should not be subject to the same restrictions, in my opinion, that are thrown around those applications where arrears follow. So in cases that come here to the House—a bill that passes Congress does not carry arrears with it, and consequently the same testimony, the same rigid, inflexible rule that is required in the Pension Office in cases that do carry arrears ought not to govern here. I think that many cases may be allowed on evidence here in the House that could not be allowed rightly in the Pension Office, where, if allowed, arrears would follow. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say a few words in relation to this matter. I submit to gentlemen on this floor the question as to whether this is a court or a Congress. If it is a court, then we ought to be, and must be, very particular in construing the law, as well as the rules of evidence, but if it is the Congress of the United States, for the purpose of passing laws, a body which has power to frame laws for the relief of the wronged and injured citizen, I care not whether he has been wronged by the ignorance, the carelessness, the hurry, the error, or in any other way by the officers of the Government, whether it be through their mistakes, the mistakes of a pure and honest man, or through the carelessness of incompetent men, then this is the body to right the wrong. The best men, sir, in the world and the purest judges have erred. Error is common to all men; none are free from it.

Now, all men have the right to come to the Congress of the United States by petition for the redress of grievances. That is the constitutional prerogative. Surely there is not a man in this House who would for a moment think of depriving a worthy, honest, wounded, or sick soldier, that got his wound or contracted his disease in the service of the country, of a pension, if he can not get it and has not gotten it through the channels provided by the law when it is right and proper for him to have it. I care not for the civil service of the Government; I care not who rejected it, whether it was a clerk in the office or the Commissioner himself; whether it was examined and rejected by the purest and wisest and best man on the earth, or whether it was an ignoramus who did it; if he has been wronged then this Congress in their wisdom, when justice and equity demand it, should come forward and rectify the wrong. They ought to be estopped from setting up the plea that the man is not entitled to it if his wound was received or his disease was contracted in the service of the country.

Now, sir, I appeal to my friend from Alabama if there is anything in this case, regarding it by the strictest rule, which under that law of justice to all would enable him to claim that this man should not be allowed by the law-making power the relief he seeks? I ask him if this body, the greatest body on earth, the Congress of the United States—for it ought to be if it is not one of the greatest bodies on earth—if this body can not take into consideration all of the facts and all of the circumstances and all the law, all the equities, in order to do justice to its citizens? If it can not, then it seems to me there ought to be an amendment to the Constitution, an amendment to enable us to act as the American Congress ought to act.

Let us consider for a moment. What are we doing here to-night? Are we adjudging about laws that have been enacted? The Pension Department ought to do that. They are the judges of the law; but when we come to make laws, I am sure my warm-hearted friend from Alabama will not insist upon applying the strict rules of testimony to the case of a poor disabled soldier to preclude him from his rights. Then if it is right for the applicant to be pensioned, the bill ought to be passed without hesitation. I am tired, sir, of hearing in Congress this idea of acting according to rules and precedents. We need no precedent. We rise higher than all precedents. All the equities of the law, all the facts, all the justice, and all of the mercy belong to us, and it becomes us to act in the premises as men possessed of their attributes.

I hope we will not seek for precedents in such cases, but that we will act as becomes patriots and lawmakers in the premises. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PETTIBONE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. PETTIBONE. I ask to have a bill passed for the benefit of one of my constituents. It is the bill (H. R. 4626) for the relief of David N. Harrison. It is a case where a pension has been granted but the check has been destroyed or lost in the mail.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is that bill reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

The CHAIRMAN. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. PETTIBONE. It is bill H. R. 4626; report No. 1421.

Mr. BAGLEY. What committee reports the bill?

Mr. PETTIBONE. I hope the gentleman will not insist on asking that question.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the title of the bill?

Mr. PETTIBONE. It is "A bill for the relief of David N. Harrison." The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] reported it. It will be found on page 41 of the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the special order of the House, governing the business of this evening, to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 8 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calender reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I am quite well aware that that is the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not entertain the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I hope common consent will be given to taking up this bill. This House by common consent is always equal to the occasion, and I want relief for this constituent.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole under the special order which has been read, and it is the duty of the Chair to see that the special order of the House is not violated.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Then I have got to sit down. [Laughter.] I shall ask for unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. MATSON. I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. HOLMES. On last Friday evening the bill (H. R. 1981) was under consideration and was passed over for the evening. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be now taken up.

Mr. MATSON. We want to get through to the bottom of the page, and the committee can then take up other cases.

FRANCIS CURRAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3751) granting a pension to Francis Curran.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Francis Curran, late a sergeant of Company E, Thirteenth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3751) granting a pension to Francis Curran, submit the following report:

That Francis Curran enlisted in the Thirteenth Regiment Indiana Cavalry December 25, 1863, and was discharged from the Army November 18, 1865.

His claim for pension is sore eyes, resulting in total blindness, contracted at Huntsville, Ala., on picket duty, August 20, 1864.

The claim was rejected by the Pension Department on the ground that disability was contracted previous to enlistment in the Union service. The testimony shows that claimant first served in the rebel army. Your committee has been unable to find any satisfactory evidence that the claimant's eyes became diseased before joining the Union Army in December, 1863.

The Adjutant-General's report shows him present for duty most of the time while in the Union Army. The principal difficulty with the case is, that he was, previous to entering the United States Army, a soldier in the confederate army, and after being mustered out of the United States service, traveled through the South collecting charity, and used the following card in order to obtain assistance:

To a benevolent public:

The bearer of this, Francis Curran, having joined the confederate army at Senatobia, Miss., and as a good soldier served his time faithfully, having lost his eyesight while a prisoner of war at Louisville, Ky.

Sergeant Company B, Ninth Mississippi Regiment.

Any help will never be forgotten.

J. P. HOULIGHAN, Captain.
T. W. WHITE,
Colonel Ninth Mississippi Regiment.

The following testimony shows clearly that the statement that claimant lost his eyes while in the confederate service is not true.

Capt. Charles F. Bender, of Company E, Thirteenth Indiana Cavalry, states under oath that "claimant was sound in every respect at date of enlistment." Owen Maguire and John Tighe both state in separate affidavits—

"That they became acquainted with claimant about March, 1863, at New Albany, Ind., and said acquaintance continued until his enlistment, and they never knew him to complain of having sore eyes or being afflicted in any manner whatever, and always believed him sound in every respect."

Capt. C. F. Bender made oath in affidavit June 15, 1875:

"The claimant was attacked with disease of the eyes in line of duty on picket just near Huntsville about August 20, 1864."

Elisha Weakly, lieutenant of Company E, Thirteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, makes oath, under date of November 17, 1877:

"In the summer of 1865 I was doing provost duty near Columbus, Miss., and claimant was suffering from disease of the eyes during that time, which continued until the date of his discharge. He was a good and obedient soldier."

The following affidavit, signed by the surgeon of claimant's regiment, is sufficient to substantiate the loss of sight soon after leaving the United States service:

"NEW ORLEANS, September 3, 1872.

"I certify that the records of Charity Hospital, New Orleans, show that Francis Curran was admitted to this institution on the 19th day of March, 1866, and discharged the 11th day of June, 1866. He was suffering from total loss of sight."

A special examination conducted by Charles R. Connor, special agent, September 28, 1878, reads as follows:

"This is a very peculiar case, and I have been unable to find any satisfactoy evidence that the claimant's eyes became diseased while he was in the confederate army. It is possible, but highly improbable, that his eyes were diseased at the time of his enlistment, December 25, 1863."

The fact that the claimant served in the confederate army ought not of itself to bar him from receiving a pension, and the testimony seems conclusive that he served faithfully nearly two years in the Army of the United States, and has been totally blind ever since his discharge.

The passage of the bill is recommended.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to say just one word about this bill. It is proposed to give a pension of $72 a month to an applicant who was at one time a confederate soldier.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PATRICK MURPHY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7047) granting a pension to Patrick Murphy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Patrick Murphy, late a private in the Second Independent Battery, Ohio Light Artillery.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask that the report be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7047) granting a pension to Patrick Murphy, submit the following report:

The claimant in this case enlisted September 1, 1864, as a private soldier in the Second Independent Battery, Ohio Light Artillery, and was discharged August 10, 1865. The claim for pension is that—

"While encamped at Carrollton, La., in the fall of 1864, he became afflicted with sore eyes, and after moving with the battery to Ship Island, in the Gulf, they became worse, attributable to the glare of the sun upon the sand; was also from time to time while on the island threatened with brain disease, and before his discharge had one or two fits."

The claim was rejected January 8, 1883, on the ground that there is—

"no medical evidence of origin of disease or existence at discharge, and claimant's inability to furnish satisfactory evidence of origin in the service and line of duty and continuance since discharge."

The claimant says he can not furnish the affidavit of a surgeon for treatment for sore eyes in the Army for the reason that—

"he was not treated by any physician while in the service, but that he was treated for said disease immediately after he returned from the Army, and has made every effort possible to procure testimony from the surgeon who treated him, but can not find him."

John B. and Mary Moore, of Conneaut, Ohio, testify to having—

"known the claimant for ten years before the war; that he boarded a large part of the time at their house; that he was a sound, healthy man, and that his eyes were in a sound and good condition."

Hiram J. and Stephen W. Marsh, of Conneaut, Ohio, comrades and members of the same battery with him, testify that—

"in February, 1865, at Ship Island, Mississippi, claimant contracted disease of eyes."

In an affidavit given June 13, 1882, John B. and Mary Ann Moore again testify that—

"at the time of his return from the Army, in 1865, his eyes were badly diseased and the right one almost completely lost; that they often saw him between 1865 and 1878, and during that time his eyes were badly diseased, and that he could do but little manual labor and was almost wholly dependent upon others for support."

Dr. A. H. Stephens makes affidavit that "claimant was admitted to the National Soldiers' Home, Dayton, Ohio, in Febuary, 1878, with partial loss of sight from diseased retina, pulmonary phthisis, hemorrhage of lungs, and cough, and that he is partially blind, and is still under treatment there."

Fery Quinn and Thaddeus S. Young, neighbors in Conneaut, Ohio, both testify that "claimant was a sound, healthy man previous to enlistment," and Young, being in same battery with claimant, testifies that "claimant contracted inflamed and weak eyes while at Ship Island, Mississippi, and in the line of his duty;" and he remembers, in a general way, that there were others of the command afflicted in the same manner while at Ship Island.

Dr. L. P. Sturtevant, of Conneaut, Ohio, in affidavit made March 23, 1883, swears that he "attended claimant professionally in 1875 and 1876 for sore eyes; that they were weak and the sight nearly gone. The claimant said that the cause of his eyes being affected was the reflection of the sun's rays from the sand on Ship Island, Mississippi, while in the service; his disability was at the time of treatment such as to prevent his doing any manual labor."

John Gaffney, Mary Moore, and Maggie Trimble, of Conneaut, Ohio, all testify that they knew claimant previous to enlistment, and that he had no disease of eyes, and was able to do all kinds of manual labor done on a farm; they further state that upon his return home from the Army his eyes were badly inflamed and his sight greatly impaired, and from that time until his admission to the Soldiers' Home at Dayton he was so afflicted as not to be able to perform manual labor.

These witnesses last named are vouched for as being persons of credibility and integrity. The examining surgeons at Dayton certify as follows, under date of February 1, 1882:

"He has a cataract of right eye and one partially formed in left eye. He can barely discern enough to get around the ward. He is disabled from all manual labor."

The testimony is sufficient as above given to lead your committee to the conviction that the claimant ought to have had a pension long ago, and the passage of the bill is cheerfully recommended.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

RUSSELL F. DIMMICK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6594) granting a pension to Russell F. Dimmick.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Russell F. Dimmick, late a private in Company E, First Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6594) granting a pension to Russell F. Dimmick, submit the following report:

Your committee, having examined all the papers in this case, find that Russell F. Dimmick, the claimant, enlisted January 20, 1863, in Company E, First Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and was discharged June 15, 1865. The claim for pension is—

"That at Chickamauga, Tenn., September 19, 1863, he was struck in the right eye by a fragment of a shell."

In another declaration made December 24, 1877, he states:

"On the march from Nashville, Tenn., to Hoover's Gap, Tenn., from the middle of July to August 15, 1863, had his eyes continually filled with dust, which caused inflammation and injury of the optic nerve, also affecting the eyelids, which became granulated, all of which caused partial blindness of both eyes, the right eye being now almost totally blind, and the other gradually becoming so; that he was also hit with a splinter of a shell in the right eye at the battle of Chickamauga on the 19th day of September, 1863, which has also helped to cause the blindness as herein stated."

A pension in this claim was allowed by the Pension Department January 6, 1880, but was suspended September 4 of the same year. The pension was discontinued on the ground that the disability of the claimant existed previous to enlistment.

Philip Fay, under date of February 12, 1878, swore as follows:

"Have known the claimant for over twenty years—ever since he was a little boy. Never knew or heard of his eyesight being impaired prior to his enlistment in the Army."

Michael Malone, under date of February 12, 1884, also swore:

"Have known claimant nearly all his life, and never heard of his being troubled with any disease of his eyes."

Charles C. Kimball, late captain of Company E, First Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, March 7, 1877, made oath as follows:

"The claimant was with me at the battle of Chickamauga, Tenn., September 19, 1863, and was there wounded in the eye with the splinter of a shell."

William Colter, late private Company E, First Wisconsin Volunteers, under date of February 12, 1878, makes oath:

"Claimant was disabled on the line of march from Nashville, Tenn., to Hoover's Gap, in 1863, by getting nearly blind in both eyes on account of dust and sand and a splinter of shell in his eye."

John Fitzgerald, under date of June 3, 1879, makes oath as follows:

"I know that claimant was disabled in eyesight on line of march to Hoover's Gap, from Nashville, Tenn., about July 2, 1863, by getting sand and dust in his eyes, and causing him to be sent back to hospital."

Benjamin F. Dieman, late private Company E, First Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, under date of June 24, 1879, makes oath:

"Claimant got his eyes injured on the march from Nashville to Hoover's Gap, Tenn., in July, 1863, which was the cause of his being sent back to hospital."

Joseph Hoskin and D. C. McVean testify substantially as the last two affiants.

Norman Barnes, Patrick Murphy, Dr. I. H. Stevens, and Michael Malone all testify to the condition of claimant's sight since discharge from the Army, and agree that the disability has existed continuously from the date of his discharge.

The surgeon's certificate of discharge, June 16, 1865, reads as follows:

"I find him incapable of performing the duties of a soldier because of loss of right eye, caused by explosion of another soldier's gun, and powder being blown into the eye, incurred while in the line of his duty as a soldier."

The statement of the surgeon seems to differ from the claim of Dimmick that he was hit by a splinter of a shell, but in the haste of making out such reports it is not strange that there should be a slight variance.

At a special examination, conducted in November, 1880, by James H. Clements, special agent, several witnesses swear that claimant had sore eyes previous to enlistment; but the fact remains abundantly proven that he was struck in the right eye with fragment of a shell. The examining surgeons certify that "he sees but little with right eye."

Considering all the testimony, your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] to the fact that the next bill on the Calendar, the bill (S. 315) granting a pension to William Reinhardt, has been returned to the Senate in accordance with their request.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to state that the House bill for the benefit of the same person passed the Senate and became a law at the last session. I was to make the motion that the bill be reported with the recommendation that it do lie on the table; but if the bill is in the hands of the Senate, of course that motion can not be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is not here.

Mr. MATSON. Under the circumstances I think it should go off the Calendar.

FREDERICK P. DEARTH.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call up a bill on page 49 of the Calendar, the bill (H. R. 7315) granting a pension to Frederick P. Dearth. Mr. Dearth is 81 years old, and is in the poor-house in one of the counties of my district. He gave his son to the cause of the Union. The son died at Corinth of typhoid fever. The old man is quite feeble, and it is hardly likely that he will be alive at another session of Congress. I ask the indulgence of the House to take up the bill and pass it that he may derive some benefit from it.

The bill (H. R. 7315) granting a pension to Frederick P. Dearth was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Frederick P. Dearth, dependent father of Edwin P. Dearth, late of the Fifty-second Illinois Volunteers.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7315) granting a pension to Frederick P. Dearth, submit the following report:

The claimant was the father of Edwin D. Dearth, a private in Company H, Fifty-second Regiment of Illinois Volunteers. The soldier enlisted September 24, 1861. He served faithfully until the battle of Corinth, October 3, 1863, when he was taken prisoner. Near the close of that month he was paroled and sent to Benton Barracks. The following March he was returned to his regiment, near Corinth, Miss., and on the 21st of August, 1863, he died in the military hospital of dysentery. The soldier's mother died in 1850. The trustee of Louisville Township, Pottawatomie County, testifies:

"That by virtue of his office he is overseer of the poor; that Frederick P. Dearth for more than one year past to date (May 29, 1883) has been a pauper and supported at the public expense; that I have been for several years acquainted with Mr. Dearth, and know him to be a worthy man; and that he has not property of any kind out of which he can support himself."

The claimant testifies that he had property to the value of $200 when his son died; that he was in part dependent on his son for support, and that his son died leaving no wife or child. Claimant is now in his eighty-first year, old and decrepit, and unable to furnish the evidence required by the Pension Department showing his dependence on the soldier at the time of the latter's death.

While the evidence furnished establishes the facts stated above, they are not sufficient to justify the Pension Department in granting a pension, but it makes a case which Congress ought to act upon promptly by the immediate passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DANIEL M'ALPIN.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask consent to make a statement. I met yesterday a soldier of the war of 1812, now 90 years old. I am satisfied that he can live but thirty or sixty days longer. A bill granting him a pension has been reported favorably by the Committee on Pensions, and is on page 52 of the Calendar. I ask the indulgence of the Committee of the Whole that his case may be taken up and passed to-night.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7503) for the relief of Daniel McAlpin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the charge of desertion against Daniel McAlpin, Sixteenth United States Infantry, war of 1812, be, and it is hereby, removed.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the rules and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Daniel McAlpin, formerly of the Sixteenth United States Infantry, war of 1812.

The report (by Mr. LAIRD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Daniel McAlpin, respectfully report:

The records show that Daniel McAlpin enlisted on the 25th day of May, 1814, in the Sixteenth United States Infantry, for five years, war of 1812. He was present for duty up to February 28, 1815. On the April rolls he is reported as having deserted March 15, 1815. His claim was rejected by the Pension Office on that ground. Claimant says that he enlisted for five years or the war; that the war being over in March, 1815, he applied for leave to go home to see his sick mother; that his captain granted the furlough, and told him he could stay home until he called for him, and that he was never called upon, and had no knowledge that he was reported a deserter until he was so informed when he made his application for pension.

Your committee recommend that the charge of desertion be removed from this old soldier, and that he be allowed a pension for his few remaining years. They therefore offer a bill as a substitute for H. R. 6950, and recommend that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS SIMPSON.

Mr. MATSON. I have a request to make. I have received several letters from Indiana—one from a member of our State senate—in relation to the case of Thomas Simpson. The bill for his relief is on page 50 of the Calendar, having been reported favorably by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. This man is in extremely indigent circumstances, and relief in his case ought to be granted immediately. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up out of its order and passed.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1924) granting a pension to Thomas Simpson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Simpson, late a private in the Seventh Indiana Battery in the war of the rebellion.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1924) granting a pension to Thomas Simpson, late of the Seventh Indiana Battery, beg to offer the following report:

The claimant, Simpson, enlisted January 2, 1864, as a private in the Seventh Indiana Battery. At that time the evidence is conclusive that he was a strong and healthy man.

George C. Masterman, who was second lieutenant of the battery, testifies that on or about the 22d of July, 1864, at Atlanta, Ga., the battery was ordered into position; that the claimant, with others, was ordered in front of the battery to carry rails to build breastworks; while so engaged the order was given to fire; Simpson, not being aware of the order, came immediately in range of one of the guns, the concussion of the shell or the powder knocking him down, rendering him insensible for fifteen or twenty minutes, he being so close to the gun that his face was blackened by the powder; that after this occurrence he was never able to do full duty again during the remainder of his term of service; that before this he had always been able to do duty at all times.

Comrades Fletcher, Johnson, and Deford all testify substantially to the foregoing, saying they were present and witnessed the occurrence and that they can not be mistaken about it.

The evidence is that there was no surgeon with the battery regularly; that occasionally one would be detailed, but would remain only a short time. The records of the Surgeon-General's Office show that Simpson was admitted to general hospital at Jeffersonville, Ind., May 23, 1865, from New Albany, Ind., as convalescent (no other diagnosis), and returned to duty June 8, 1865. That the regimental records are not on file. Claimant was discharged July 13, 1865, under provisions of General Order No. 27, Department of Kentucky. His neighbors who were acquainted with him before he entered the service testify that since discharge he has not been able to perform labor for at least two-thirds to three-fourths of the time.

The claimant filed application for a pension in June, 1866, and alleged partial deafness and blindness. Also incapacity to do manual labor, caused by concussion. This has been rejected by the Pension Office for the reason that the medical examination does not disclose the fact that applicant was injured to the extent of preventing him from obtaining a living by manual labor. Against this, however, is the testimony of his neighbors, who all unite in saying that they knew him before he entered the service to be a strong, healthy man, and since discharge that he is a broken-down man and not able to do manual labor; that his injury has developed into epilepsy, and at the present time that he is totally incapacitated from earning a living by manual labor.

Your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN PENSIONERS.

Mr. HOLMES. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House take up for consideration out of its order the bill (H. R. 1981) for the relief of certain pensioners enrolled by special acts of Congress.

This bill applies to a small class of pensioners. It provides substantially that where a special act has been passed by Congress the Pension Office may increase the rate of pension if the disability has increased since the date of the passage of such special act.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I must object to the consideration of that bill, because it is not a private bill, but ought to be on the Public Calendar.

Mr. HOLMES. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that if consent be given that the bill be taken up and favorably considered to-night in Committee of the Whole I will not press it to a vote in the House to-night, but it may go over to be voted upon by a full House.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is it on the Private Calendar?

Mr. PERKINS. The order under which we are acting does not confine us to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But this bill is on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. This, I understand, is a public bill, not a private bill. It applies to a class of pensioners. It is a general bill, and ought to be on the Public Calendar.

Mr. HOLMES. This bill has been placed by the Speaker of the House upon the Private Calendar; and I suppose he considered it a proper bill to be placed there. It relates to a small class of pensioners.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It may have gone to the Private Calendar because the attention of the Speaker was not called to the fact that it was not a private bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Alabama as objecting to the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOLMES].

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had had under consideration, pursuant to order, sundry bills on the Private Calendar reported by the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry recommendations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed there are two bills coming over from the session of last Friday night.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that they be passed over informally not losing their place.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed.

A bill (H. R. 7141) granting a pension to Daniel W. Adams;
A bill (H. R. 6726) granting a pension to Margaret A. Maguire;
A bill (H. R. 4266) granting a pension to Margaret A. Ringwalt;

A bill (H. R. 1924) granting a pension to Thomas Simpson.

Amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House to bills of the following titles were severally agreed to, and the bills as amended were respectively ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 3355) for the relief of Mary Mulholland; and
A bill (H. R. 2538) granting a pension to Christiana Almier.

PLEASANT MINET.

A bill (H. R. 4751) granting a pension to Pleasant Minet, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with a recommendation that it lie on the table, was accordingly laid on the table.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the various votes by which bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. MATSON (at 10 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 10, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order of business, and move that the morning hour be dispensed with. My purpose is to go on with the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. STORM. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STORM. At the adjournment of the House yesterday, or rather at the time of taking a recess, the yeas and nays were ordered on a substitute to a bill then pending for the relief of Capt. Nicholas J. Bigley. I desire to know whether that comes up this morning as the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. It is the unfinished business of the class to which it belongs; that is to say, of private bills. Under the practice of the House, when the previous question is ordered on the passage of a bill at the time of the adjournment it comes up the next day as unfinished business. But in this case the previous question was not ordered, nor was the pending question on the passage of the bill, but on an amendment. It will come up next Friday as unfinished business.

Pending the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to dispense with the morning hour, the Chair by unanimous consent will lay before the House personal requests of members.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. WOOD, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. DIBBLE, for five days.

To Mr. RANKIN, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. ADAMS, of New York, until Tuesday next.

RELIEF OF EX-ARMY OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Military Affairs, by unanimous consent, asks leave to have printed for its use testimony taken referring to sundry bills for the relief of various ex-officers of the Army. If there be no objection it will be ordered accordingly.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that if the House shall not be disposed to dispense with the morning hour and take up the naval appropriation bill, I will ask the favor of the House to proceed to the consideration of the bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds under the special order of the House. If the House shall take up the naval appropriation bill, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has assured the House it would not take longer than half an hour, I now give notice that when that bill has been disposed of I will call up the special order which I have indicated, which, under the order, takes precedence even of the morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the special order to which the gentleman refers was made subject to the consideration of appropriation bills. Yet that special order is an extraordinary one, the like of which I never saw before during my entire Congressional career. It provides that it shall be in order until the many bills which the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have designated or may designate shall be considered and disposed of, and that this special order continue from day to day until all such bills on the House Calendar and the Speaker's table shall have been considered and acted upon by the House.

In the next place, I wish the House to understand that unless it is ready to co-operate in the passage of general appropriation bills there may be danger of an extra session of the next Congress, which I consider will be of much injury to the country, and still more to the party to which I belong.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, a few words in reply to what has fallen from the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He speaks of the special order providing for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings as an extraordinary one. Will he be good enough to point out in what respect it is extraordinary?

Mr. RANDALL. It is most extraordinary in this, that it combines all these public buildings bills together, and provides that it shall be continuous until every single one of the public buildings bills embraced in the long list of those reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on the Calendars of the House and on the Speaker's table shall be considered and disposed of. I stated the other day that there were thirty-five of them, but since then I find there are very many more. That special order is peculiar in the fact that it specially provides that every one of those public buildings bills shall be considered and disposed of, and that that special order shall be operative until that takes place. It provides that the House shall consider every bill that the committee may present for consideration.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I say it is no such thing.

Mr. RANDALL. Read the order.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I have read it time and again.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it be read.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I have the floor, and when I get through the gentleman can have it for any purpose he desires.

I wish to state further, Mr. Speaker, that however extraordinary it may be in the opinion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it nevertheless received much more than a two-thirds vote in this House on the 9th day of last April. A gentleman suggests that he did not understand it; it was read at the time, and if that be so he may not be able to understand it, I will say with due deference to my friend.

Now, the only difference between this special order and going into Committee of the Whole upon the Calendar in the ordinary way, without such order, is, that instead of having these bills all considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, open to unlimited debate, it is provided that the debate on each bill shall be limited to thirty minutes—fifteen minutes on each side—with unlimited amendment. It also provides in the second place that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds shall have the power to designate what particular bills they shall call up for consideration. Those are the only two points of difference between this special order and proceeding in the ordinary way without it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I object.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I hope that will not be done, after the remarks which have been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to make a speech on the bill granting pensions to Mexican soldiers, and can not be heard.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I hope the gentleman will have an opportunity to be heard on that bill, and that he will not object to my proceeding.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will be permitted to go on and make his speech, although I do not think he can answer the objection I have made.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will leave that to the House and the country if I can be heard.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word in response to what the gentleman has said about having an extra session.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I renew the objection to this debate.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I hope my friend from North Carolina will not make the objection now, in view of what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. What he has said demands some notice on my part. The gentleman has said that this proceeding would force an extra session. I want to show that he is the gentleman himself who led the filibustering against the order of the House made by a large majority of the House, and which proceeding if kept up by him may force an extra session.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I submit that my colleague ought to have an opportunity of saying a word at least in response to what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if he desires it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. A great deal has already been said. The gentleman has made quite a long speech, and, as I have said, I would like to be heard on the Mexican pension bill. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Then if the House will not permit me to be heard, I wish to state that I will take the opportunity to make a fitting response at some future time. I wish gentlemen to understand that I have some rights on this floor, and my constituents have also, and I shall endeavor to maintain them.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to dispense with the morning hour.

The question was taken; and the Speaker decided that by the sound the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to dispense with the morning hour.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 83, not voting 105; as follows:

The SPEAKER. This is not a privileged report.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I understand it to be so.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of revenue and general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the title of the bill first in order.

A bill (H. R. 7857) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The next bill in order was the bill (H. R. 7874) making additional appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I ask that the first reading of this bill be dispensed with, and that the Committee of the Whole now proceed to consider the bill by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with. The Chair hears none. The Clerk will now proceed to read the bill by paragraphs.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Before that is done I desire to state that this bill makes appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885; that is, for the six months beginning on the 1st of January last, at which time the appropriations made at the last session for this service expired. I ask that the Clerk read the report of the Committee on Appropriations which accompanies this bill and explains in detail its provisions. I think the reading of this report will better inform the Committee of the Whole in regard to the measure than any remarks I might be able to make on the subject.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report, which is as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, in presenting the accompanying bill making additional appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, submit the following report in explanation thereof:

The bill makes provision for the naval service for the six months ending June 30, 1885, on the basis of the bill which passed the House during the first session of this Congress, giving for each item of expenditure just one-half of the amount contained in said bill, with the following exceptions:

For current expenses Bureau of Yards and Docks, in lieu of one-half, or $100,000, there is given $90,000.

For necessary repairs under Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, in lieu of one-half, or $5,000, there is given $2,500.

For current expenses Bureau of Construction and Repair, in lieu of one-half, or $500,000, there is given $450,000.

For current expenses Bureau of Steam-Engineering, in lieu of one-half, or $375,000, there is given $280,000, together with the unexpended balance, $140,000, from the appropriation in 1884 for the monitors.

For pay of the Navy and the Marine Corps there is given, in lieu of one-half the amount contained in said bill, a sum equal to the balance remaining after deducting the appropriations for the first six months from the whole sum proposed in said bill.

There is nothing in the bill for the steel cruisers, appropriations to complete them having already been made.

The bill appropriates in all $6,120,155.48, which, added to the sum appropriated for the first six months which ended December 31, 1884, $8,860,317.11, makes the total appropriation for the Navy for the entire fiscal year of 1885 $14,980,472.59, or $913,961.64 less than was appropriated for the fiscal year 1884.

The bill as now proposed contains the same features of new legislation that were embodied in the bill which passed the House at the last session, except that the following is excluded:

"And all officers of the Navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers, clerks, or enlisted men in the regular or volunteer Army or Navy, or both, and shall receive all the benefits of such actual service, in all respects in the same manner as if all said service had been continuous and in the regular Navy, in the grade having graduated pay held by such officer at the time of the passage of this act; and the record of all service of such officer shall be entered in full, opposite his name, in the appropriate columns of the Navy Register, in the same manner as service in the regular Navy is credited: Provided, That nothing in this clause shall be so construed as to authorize any change in the dates of commission or in the relative rank of such officers: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give any additional or longevity pay to any such officer during the time of his service in the volunteer Army or Navy."

The unexpended balances of the appropriations made for the first six months of the year are reappropriated and made available for expenditure during the last half of the year.

Following is a table which shows by items the appropriations for the Navy for 1884; the amounts proposed by the House in the bill passed during the first session; the amounts proposed by the Senate by its amendments to said bill, and the amounts appropriated for the first half of the year 1885; the amounts proposed by the House for the last half of the year 1885; the first and second propositions of the Senate for that period; and the amounts now proposed by the accompanying bill.

* Also reappropriates an unexpended balance of $140,000 from appropriations for 1884 for the monitors.

Mr. HUTCHINS (before the Clerk had completed the reading). I think it unnecessary that the Clerk should read the remainder of the report, embracing merely a tabulated statement showing items of expenditure for 1884, which has been printed for the information of the House, and for comparison with the appropriations proposed in the pending bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say that, so far as I am advised, this bill has the unanimous concurrence of the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the pay of the Navy, for the active-list, namely: For one Admiral, one Vice-Admiral, eight rear-admirals, seven chiefs of bureaus, twenty-one commodores, forty-five captains, eighty-seven commanders, seventy-eight lieutenant-commanders, two hundred and seventy-two lieutenants, ninety-five junior lieutenants, nincty-five ensigns, ninety-eight junior ensigns, fourteen medical directors, fifteen medical inspectors, fifty surgeons, seventy-nine passed assistant surgeons, eight assistant surgeons, two assistant surgeons not in the line of promotion (who shall hereafter, after fifteen years' service, be entitled to receive, as annual pay, when at sea, $2,100, when on shore duty $1,800, and when on leave or waiting orders $1,600), thirteen pay-directors, twelve pay-inspectors, forty-nine paymasters, twenty-nine passed assistant paymasters, twenty assistant paymasters, sixty-nine chief engineers, ninety-three passed assistant engineers, seventy-eight assistant engineers, twenty-four chaplains, eleven professors of mathematics, ten naval constructors, nine assistant naval constructors, ten civil engineers, one hundred and eighty-eight warrant officers, thirty-eight mates, two hundred and ninety-five naval cadets; in all, $1,743,750. Naval line officers may be detailed as instructors in mathematics or other branches of learning in any schools or colleges, according to the act of February 26, 1879; but the total number of all naval officers so detailed shall not exceed forty.

Mr. GLASCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that part of the paragraph from line 32 to line 36, which is in these words:

Naval line officers may be detailed as instructors in mathematics or other branches of learning in any schools or colleges, according to the act of February 26, 1879; but the total number of all naval officers so detailed shall not exceed forty.

My point of order is that that is new legislation and not in the direction of economy.

Mr. HUTCHINS. That provision in the bill undoubtedly is subject to the point of order made by the gentleman from California, but I will state that the same provision passed the House at the last session of Congress, although the bill failed to become a law. If the gentleman insists upon his point of order I think it is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained and the portion of the paragraph indicated is ruled out.

The Clerk read as follows:

For two secretaries, one to the Admiral and one to the Vice-Admiral, clerks to paymasters, clerks at inspections, navy-yards, and stations, and extra pay to men enlisted under honorable discharge; commission and interest, transportation of funds, exchange; mileage to officers while traveling under orders in the United States, and for actual personal expenses of officers while traveling abroad under orders, and for traveling expenses of apothecaries, yeomen, and civilian employés, and for actual and necessary traveling expenses of naval cadets while proceeding from their homes to the Naval Academy for examination and appointment as cadets, and for the payment of any such officers as may be in service, either upon the active or retired list, during the year ending June 30, 1885, in excess of the numbers of each class provided for in this act, and for any increase of pay arising from different duty, as the needs of the service may require; for rent and furniture of buildings and offices not in navy-yards; expenses of courts-martial and courts of inquiry, boards of investigation, examining boards, with clerks' and witnesses' fees, and traveling expenses and costs; stationery and recording; expenses of purchasing-paymasters' offices at the various cities, including clerks, furniture, fuel, stationery, and incidental expenses; newspapers and advertising; foreign postage; telegraphing, foreign and domestic; telephones; copying; care of library; mail and express wagons, and livery and express fees; costs of suits; commissions, warrants, diplomas, and discharges; relief of vessels in distress, and pilotage; recovery of valuables from shipwrecks; quarantine expenses; care and transportation of the dead; reports, professional investigation, cost of special instruction, and information from abroad, and the collection and classification thereof, $187,500.

Mr. MORSE. I move, after the word "dollars," in line 88, to insert the following:

And all officers of the Navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers, clerks, or enlisted men in the regular or volunteer Army or Navy, or both, and shall receive all the benefits of such actual service in all respects in the same manner as if all said service had been continuous and in the regular Navy, in the grade having graduated pay held by such officer at the time of the passage of this act; and the record of all service of every such officer shall be entered in full, opposite his name, in the appropriate columns of the Naval Register, in the same manner as service in the regular Navy is credited: Provided, That nothing in this clause shall be so construed as to authorize any change in the dates of commission or in the relative rank of such officers: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give any additional or longevity pay to any such officer during the time of his service in the volunteer army or navy.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I make the point of order that that is new legislation and not in the line of retrenchment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MORSE. I do not. If the point of order is insisted upon I have no doubt it will hold good as against my amendment. However, I would like to state that this provision was offered in the House before the bill went to the Senate, and that there was an almost unanimous vote in its favor. I regret, of course, that my friend from New York should deem it to be his duty to make the point of order against the amendment, because if the provision be not allowed to come into the naval appropriation bill it will be impossible otherwise to establish any such regulation in the law.

Mr. HUTCHINS. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts I will state that it is the desire on the part of the Committee on Appropriations if possible to have this bill passed as it has been reported, as the gentleman knows there has been a conflict between the House and Senate on this subject.

The regular annual appropriation bill for 1886 will come in in a short while, and to that bill the gentleman can move his amendment. At present we have not the time to consider it. I do not know what the effect will be, and I am therefore compelled to interpose the point of order.

Mr. MORSE. I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of reporting the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7874) making additional appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the vote on the passage of the bill must be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. This bill is based upon estimates of the Department, and as a general appropriation bill the rule requires the vote on its passage shall be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. It is based upon the estimates of the Department and is a reappropriation of all moneys unexpended during the first six months, and then in another of its features it runs the two periods together so as to cover the fiscal year.

Mr. REED. I ask if we can not have unanimous consent to dispense with taking the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania insists on the vote being taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. Of course he must have his amusement.

Mr. RANDALL. I must have the rules of the House executed.

Mr. REED. But the rules can be dispensed with always by unanimous consent.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 209, nays 0, not voting 114; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. REED. I would like to hear the names of the negative side read. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. REED. No; only I would like to hear the names in the negative.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio, on all political questions, for this day.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. GOFF, on political questions, for this day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, for this day.

Mr. GEORGE with Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, on political questions, for this day.

Mr. PUSEY with Mr. MCCOID, for the remainder of this day.

Mr. LOWRY with Mr. PETERS.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HUTCHENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. THOMPSON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has submitted a motion.

Mr. SINGLETON. I appeal to the gentleman from Missouri to allow this bill to pass over until Monday next, and give the balance of this day and part of Monday for the consideration of the Library bill. I am sure it can be disposed of in that time; and I think the House will agree that I have exercised a patience almost equal to that of Job himself in giving way as I have done to the consideration of other measures, knowing as I do that a majority of the House want the bill to pass.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Permit me to suggest that we had better take up the educational bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. SINGLETON. I will ask the gentleman to show some magnanimity in this matter.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SINGLETON. I give notice, then, that I shall next week press this bill for consideration in season and out of season until it is disposed of.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I would like to give notice to my friend from Mississippi that I shall antagonize his bill with the Mexican war pension bill.

Mr. WILLIS. The educational bill will probably take precedence.

The motion of Mr. BURNES was then agreed to.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the general appropriation bills.

The Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7857) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the first formal reading of the bill will be dispensed with, and it will be read by paragraphs for amendment and debate.

The Clerk read the first section of the bill.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. That has already been done by consent. The Clerk will now read the bill by paragraphs.

Mr. BURNES. I do not think it was the intention to proceed with the consideration of the bill by sections until after some general debate had taken place.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize anybody who desires to debate the bill.

Mr. BURNES. I have nothing special to offer in the way of general debate upon the bill, but perhaps a brief explanation of some of its provisions ought to be made; and in view of the fact that some gentlemen upon the floor have expressed a desire to present some views with reference to certain features of the bill before it is read by sections, I have asked that general debate be allowed. I will state simply and generally that I think the bill now pending meets the approbation of the large majority of the members of both sides of the House. I also think it substantially meets the views of the State Department, although it does not materially differ from the legislation of the last session of Congress. The differences are so slight that it is perhaps unnecessary to call specific attention to them. There are one or two items, however, to which I shall refer and ask the attention of the House.

One item especially, with reference to an estimate of $224,000, which is omitted from the bill was recommended for the purpose of resurveying and re-establishing the boundary line between Mexico and the United States. Upon a careful investigation of the treaty with regard to this subject it is beyond all question in my mind—and I need not detain the committee by going over it entirely—but it is beyond all question in my mind that we are not yet in a position to make an appropriation for that survey, and there are a great many antecedent acts that have got to be done and performed before we will be in a condition to undertake the re-establishing of this boundary line.

It may be sufficient to state that the treaty provides for a reconnaissance, which shall be made by the representatives of the two governments; and necessarily we could not undertake to establish this line as it ought to be established or re-establish it without the approbation and the sanction of the Mexican Government. The treaty provided that representatives of that government should meet the representatives of this Government in the preliminary survey and reconnaissance. They were not present. They have made no report to their government as provided for by the treaty, and no international boundary commission as required by the treaty has been organized; nor have any estimates of the cost been made by this commission, as required by that treaty. In short, so many things remain undone that that treaty requires to be done before the Mexican Government would be bound to us for one-half of the cost of the work that I apprehend there can be no question as to the propriety at this time of not making an appropriation for that purpose. I may say in addition, sir, that if the appropriation should be deemed necessary it would be properly and more properly placed in the sundry civil bill than in this, so that it may be considered in that bill, if it is desired by the House or by the committee at any time hereafter to do so.

The reductions from the current law amount to $29,080; that is to say, the reductions made by the committee. Some $46,000—I mean of the current law—have been omitted at the suggestion and the instance of the State Department; so that it may be said the bill now pending reduces the current law but $29,000. It increases in the way of additional consuls and clerks to consulates and in an appropriation under the neutrality act of $12,000. The aggregate increase is $41,000; so that you perceive while the reduction is $29,000 the increase amounts to $41,000.

Mr. CHACE. Is the gentleman from Missouri speaking now of the gross appropriation of the bill?

Mr. BURNES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHACE. I read at the end of the bill, in the recapitulation, that you have made a reduction.

Mr. BURNES. There is an apparent discrepancy, for the reason that the $224,000 appropriated for the Mexican boundary commission are not mentioned in these figures which I have given. That would increase the reduction. But I am speaking of the reduction and increase from the current law and not the estimates.

Mr. CHACE. As I understand the statement at the end of the bill, the amount of the law for 1885 was $1,225,140. The amount of this bill is $1,190,885. Am I right?

Mr. BURNES. That is right.

Mr. CHACE. Is not that a reduction of $34,255?

Mr. BURNES. There is a net reduction, including these items which have been dropped out at the instance of the Secretary of State and which have led to this confusion. There is a net decrease of $34,000.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that the committee were by no means unanimous concerning the appropriation of $12,000 under the neutrality act. So far as I am individually concerned I am opposed to that appropriation. But I shall not undertake now to go over ground that was so thoroughly argued at the last session of Congress.

I yield now to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

Mr. TOWNSHEND addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BURNES rose.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. BURNES. I will yield to the gentleman for any time he may desire.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Chairman, when a bill similar to the one now before the committee was under discussion, making appropriations for the diplomatic service for the current fiscal year, I expressed my opinion of it more fully than I shall attempt to do now. It is the same old subject of taxing the toilers at home to enable the fops and dandies of our diplomacy to make fools of themselves and of us abroad. It is not likely that I shall be here a year hence when the next grab upon the Treasury shall be made for this purpose, and therefore I venture a very few remarks now.

If I were preaching a sermon upon this subject I should choose for my text the question, "Who shall deliver us from the body of this death?" What Congress will have the courage to free us from the disgrace of our diplomacy abroad by abolishing the system altogether, as was suggested by Albert Gallatin and other illustrious statesmen of an earlier and better day? It is an eyesore to mankind and an ulcer on the body of republicanism. It is a school of snobbery, to which we send such dandy politicians as are of no use at home to disgrace themselves and degrade republicanism in the circles of the effete monarchies of the Old World. No longing eye or heavy heart of any republican in foreign countries ever caught a ray of hope from any act or word of any of our modern American ministers. All their ambition seems to be to curry favor with despotism and to find themselves at the table of some profligate lord. No member of this House can point to any service rendered by any of our recent ministers abroad worth the paper on which this bill is printed. Every penny we appropriate for this service is devoted to the task of teaching Americans to forget Americanism and to imitate, as far as they can, the follies of the aristocracy.

We have several times passed laws that our diplomatists abroad should not wear any dress but that which any plain American citizen would wear in common life at home, and yet I will venture to say that scarcely one member of our diplomatic corps obeys them. I have seen it stated in the columns of the Washington Republican of December 19, 1883, that a member of this House, visiting London, called upon our envoy extraordinary to the Court of St. James, and that he found him arrayed in court dress, with knee-breeches not too well adapted to his attenuated legs, ready to represent the workingmen of the United States at the Queen's drawing-room, and that our democratic member came away with the impression that Mr. Lowell was the best nickel-plated Englishman he had ever seen.

Now, what are we to do with this system? Here we are from year to year voting away about $2,000,000 for this not only useless but deleterious purpose. Why? Because we did it last year. Why then?

Because we did it the year before. And so it will be; the abuse has become chronic, and we go on making the useless and corrupting appropriation. If you want to spend so much money why not devote it to some useful purpose? The twenty or thirty millions we have thrown away in the last dozen years would have built and endowed a magnificent hospital in each State and Territory in the Union, where our sick and suffering soldiers or their widows and orphans, now begging for pensions, would have found a comfortable home. Why not rather in the future give it to the suffering poor at home than send it to our profligates abroad—to a lot of snobs, incurable snobs, who are trying to perpetuate their kind and enhance their value abroad? I protest against the whole system.

Imagine a poor fellow from Hocking Valley, an American workingman, where he and his companions are on a strike against monopolies in trying to get a reward for his labor sufficient to support his wife and family, going to Europe to see how the taxes which he is compelled to pay to support his Government are spent. In London he finds our minister, dressed up in the style to which I have referred, with his dear Lord Granville and other democrats around him, holding forth and illustrating in his person the beneficence and beauties of American diplomacy. In Paris he sees our amiable and gentlemanly minister, who misrepresents him and his fellow-workingmen at that gay capital, in the midst of the society which calls itself the American colony, who were described by the lady correspondent of the Washington Post, Mrs. Lucy H. Hooper, in that paper of June 22, 1884, as snobs, who were ashamed of their native land and of their nationality; who "scorn the society of chaste women and high-minded men, because, forsooth, those personages have been born in the United States and are undecorated with titles, while they welcome to their houses all the 'spotted peaches' of the Parisian society basket"—women who would not be admitted into any decent society in New York, if New York society knows herself, "and she thinks she do." What report do you suppose this American workingman would make as to the value or services of our ministers abroad?

As this bill appropriates money for the support of our ministers for the fiscal year commencing next July, the appointment of those ministers will most likely be made by a Democratic President. I hope for a change for the better, but if our ministers are more than useless under one party, they can hardly be expected to prove useful under another. Whichever party may be in power, I think the best thing to do would be to abolish the offices of ministers abroad and depend entirely on our consuls and commercial agents, by whom all the interests of the country could be properly cared for, or in case of any emergency special ministers could be appointed for the occasion.

I understand that already two men have been prominently mentioned for the English mission, each of whom feels confident of success and is spoken of with approbation by Democratic papers and politicians, and yet, sir, I have no hesitation in saying that I would infinitely prefer Mr. Lowell to either of them. Deeply as I despise his conduct and abhor his acts as our minister, I should greatly prefer his continuance in the office which he has disgraced than have a Democratic dude take his place to disgrace it and to disgrace the Democratic party, which as yet stands guiltless in this respect. Indeed, I think the venerable Dr. Burchard would be preferable to either of them. Dr. Burchard is not a snob and would not represent snobbery. He is a man of express ideas and runs into the alliterative. I do not say he should be appointed our representative either at home or abroad, but he would be preferable to either of the two gentlemen mentioned, from one of whom he learned his lesson of "Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion." It was not original with him, but copied from one of those who expect to succeed Mr. Lowell.

And here I take occasion to repeat, what I have often already stated, that I do not believe Dr. Burchard's famous alliterative speech at the Fifth Avenue Hotel reception changed the vote of one single citizen from Mr. Blaine to Mr. Cleveland; or if a single voter may have been influenced by it I feel quite certain that the number is very small, and that very few would apply for any reward that might be offered for the discovery of Irish-Americans whose votes were changed by that speech. The election did not turn upon any such nonsense. The American people will always frown upon bigotry from whichever side it comes, but they never permit the casual remark of any person to work detriment to those who are nowise responsible for it.

This diplomatic service is working our ruin by creating a desire for foreign customs and foreign follies. The disease is imported by our returning diplomatists and by the foreign embassadors sent here by monarchs and despots to corrupt and destroy our American ideas. They should both be quarantined as we quarantine foreign rags through fear of cholera. I find in the Boston Pilot of to-day a letter from the patriot Archbishop Croke, of Ireland, which expresses my opinion on our adopting English customs and habits so well, that I can quote a paragraph from it as my own, simply changing the word "Irishman" to "American." It is written to the secretary of the Gaelic athletic association, and is accompanied by a letter of similar import from Mr. Parnell. The paragraph reads thus:

One of the most painful, let me assure you, and, at the same time one of the most frequently recurring reflections that as an Irishman (American) I am compelled to make, in connection with the present aspect of things in this country, is derived from the ugly and irritating fact that we are daily importing from England not only her manufactured goods, which we can not help doing, since she has practically strangled our own manufacturing appliances, but together with her fashions, her accent, her vicious literature, her music, her dances, and her manifold mannerisms, her games, also, and her pastimes, to the utter discredit of our own grand, national sports, and to the sore humiliation, as I believe, of every genuine son and daughter of the land.

And then he goes on to designate as foreign and fantastic field-sports, lawn-tennis, polo, croquet, cricket, and the like.

Our Revolutionary fathers saw the danger we were in and provided, as well as they could, against it, both in the Constitution and by the law. In the Fifth Congress Mr. Tazewell, of Virginia, introduced into the Senate of the United States a resolution that no Senator should receive or give any visit to or from any agent or embassador of any foreign country without asking leave of the Senate; and when, in last May, I introduced a similar resolution in this House, it was denounced in a leading paper of this country as "rampant and unapproachable absurdity." The writer for that paper was an Englishman, and of course looked upon this American idea as absurd. And upon another occasion, when I introduced some very sensible resolutions to be acted upon by this House against these foreign influences, the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. DUNHAM], whom I see before me, building better than he knew, had it referred to the Committee on Public Health. A very proper reference, seeing that all this English craze is becoming a stench in the nostrils of the American people, and requires some powerful disinfectant to purify the American mind and the American atmosphere from these offensive and polluting influences.

Our Revolutionary fathers also wisely provided by constitutional enactment that no person holding office under the United States should receive any gift from any foreign power. They were afraid that any gifts thus received would weaken our hatred of monarchical institutions, and they took care that every subject of these monarchies seeking citizenship here should renounce and abjure all allegiance to such monarchy. All these provisions and precautions were intended to guard us from any influence which monarchs or their agents should attempt to exercise upon us. Now what is a present? The Queen of England sent a present of flowers to be thrown upon the coffin of our lamented dead President. Who received it? If he held office under the Government he violated the Constitution and should have been impeached. This present was a bid for our gratitude toward the giver, and that was the very thing the Constitution intended to prevent. It intended that we should not be under any gratitude or have any friendly feeling for any monarch or despot, and the more the gift is intended to evoke gratitude the greater the violation of the Constitution. The value of the present is not to be considered. The fear of our fathers was that it might excite gratitude to those to whom as republicans we should owe no gratitude. Embassadors of foreign countries come here to elevate and magnify monarchy above republicanism. Already they dominate society in Washington, and American republicanism is endangered.

If a Senator or Representative or officer of the Government finds gratification at receptions given to them by foreign embassadors, if they accept their dinners or drink their champagne, are they not violating the Constitution, which intended to prevent any who had sworn to support it from putting themselves under any obligation to monarchy? If our Congressmen and Secretaries are dining and wining with the agents of despotic governments, what chance has our citizens who languish in prisons under these despots of speedy deliverance or honest remonstrance in their behalf? These outrages on our citizenship we are enduring from all nations. It was only yesterday that the distinguished gentleman at the head of our Foreign Affairs Committee [Mr. CURTIN] had reported a case of this kind to the House. We want no presents nor social blandishments to dull the temper of our indignant demand against these outrages, and it might be well if we had such a rule as was proposed in 1798 against any member of Congress making calls upon or receiving any presents or favors, even a glass of wine, from the agents of powers inimical to republicanism. The framers of our Government intended that we should be guarded against all encroachments from foreign despots, and particularly against all presents and bribes, whether in liquid or floral form, that might induce us to cringe or fawn to monarchy or its representatives.

I fear that no remonstrance from me or from any other lover of American simplicity will stay or stem the current that is carrying us so swiftly toward monarchical ideas. I said some time ago, in a speech delivered in this House, that we were going to the devil very fast, if we had not already arrived there. Our duty—my duty—is, while we are here intrusted with the fate of the nation, to raise our voices against the vices that beset us and in favor of the American ideas of the fathers of the Republic.

Upon the floor of this House I have said many things that were considered foolish, yet if you will judge me fairly you will see that they all tend in one direction—to magnify republicanism and to repress monarchy. I have frequently had difficulty in obtaining the floor to express my views upon these subjects. I observe my friend from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] near me who occupied that chair in the last Congress, and he seemed from the beginning to be determined that I should not be heard. No commander in any battle between Bull Run and Richmond ever exercised such care to resist the enemy's approaches as my distinguished friend did to keep me from being heard in this House. I, however, harbor no ill-will toward him. He and I are both going to a higher plane of civilization. We are shortly to shake from our feet the dust of this degenerate House of Representatives, to soar into the higher region of private citizenship and to enjoy the honors of those who despise office and its perquisites. I therefore harbor no animosity toward him, and I think as we have known each other better we have come to esteem each other more.

I remember how another gentleman, now no longer in Congress, kept guard around that chair that I should not be heard on this floor. Still, however, I persevered, and whether in order or out of order accomplished my purpose. In doing so I incurred the enmity of a portion of the press, which for some purpose to me unknown either suppressed all mention of my name or perverted and misrepresented what I had said and done. It was the same in the Fortieth Congress, when in 1867–'69 I met similar abuse and misrepresentation in doing what twelve or thirteen years afterward secured for me from my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT] the eulogy which he so kindly bestowed on me in this House, which I so kindly appreciated, coming from one so distinguished as a scholar, a statesman, and a gentleman. In that eulogy he gave me credit for carrying through the Fortieth Congress the law of July 27, 1868, second only to the Declaration of Independence, amid abuse and misrepresentation similar to that which I have met in the same field of labor and under similar circumstances in the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth.

I am now near the end of a long and checkered and somewhat eventful life. There are many things in it that might as well be blotted out. But taking it altogether, I have nothing to regret and nothing to apologize for. The sins I have committed will be forgiven. The follies I have been accused of will be forgotten. But I believe the efforts I have made to vindicate the sanctity of American citizenship, its dignity and glory, by inculcating the duty of the Government to exercise its power over all its citizens, native or naturalized, to protect them from insult in foreign countries, will be remembered to my credit. I believe that with all my faults many friends will remember me kindly when I am not here and will express regret for my absence.

But whatever fate may betide me, whether in this city or elsewhere, in prosperity or adversity, as a member of this House or in some humbler position, it will always be my pride to have it stated to my children, whom I love, and to all men whose good opinion it was my ambition to deserve, that I stood up here for American principles against the dominating influence of monarchy and despotism. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that I meet the wish of the House in now asking that general debate be closed, and that we proceed to the reading of the bill by paragraphs.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] desires to be heard a brief time. I suppose there will be no objection to that.

Mr. BURNES. None at all.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Chairman, I had not expected that this bill would be called up at this time. I had prepared myself with some comparative tables, showing the difference between our manner of treating this diplomatic and consular service and the methods pursued by some foreign countries. Those figures are at my rooms; I shall therefore necessarily be very brief.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], in the course of his remarks, spoke of the importance of extending our foreign trade, of opening markets for the products of our farms, our factories, and our workshops. As to the desirability of such a result I join him most heartily; but from his methods I dissent as heartily. But I shall not attempt to-day to take up the general discussion on that subject. I wish, however, to make briefly a comparison between the policy and methods of this country and those of Great Britain.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. CHACE. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not know that the gentleman fully understood the nature of the proposition which I advocated. If it were carried out it would give us a protected market in the countries of South America, Central America, and Mexico for our products. A barrier would be put up against England, France, and Germany, while we would have a free market there for our manufactured products. Would the gentleman object to the extension of the line of protection so as to embrace those southern countries with the States of this Union?

Mr. CHACE. Oh, no; but that is only a very small part of the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is the principal feature of the proposition—its main purpose.

Mr. CHACE. If that is the case, I am very glad that such is the gentleman's object; but I thought I saw in the tenor of his remarks a very different object set forth. If I am mistaken, I am very glad to be corrected.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I argued, in order to avoid any conflict with gentlemen claiming to be free-traders, that my proposition would extend the area of free trade to those countries. At the same time it would open up a new market for us, a market protected against our only competitors—Germany, France, and England.

Mr. CHACE. Well, if the gentleman has seen the error of his ways and come around to be a protectionist, I congratulate him.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Not by any means.

Mr. CHACE. I shall be very glad to welcome the gentleman into our ranks; but I am a little suspicious of the genuineness of his conversion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman misapprehends me now more than ever. I have never been converted in the slightest degree to the doctrine of protection. I have only said this—that we ought to have as free trade with those countries as we have among our own States; and this policy will result in as great benefit to the manufacturers of this country as any doctrine of any of the protectionists.

Mr. CHACE. The gentleman is doing very well if he has reached a point where he can look even with complacency on protection, and I would remind him of the passage from Watts—

While the lamp holds out to burn, &c.

Now, we hear a great deal about overproduction and the extension of our markets. We hear it particularly from gentlemen on the other side, who are in favor of breaking down American industry and throwing open the markets of our country to the competition of foreign manufacturers. But I am sorry to say that whenever they are brought to the test we see by their actions, if I judge them aright, that they are as circumscribed in their policy in regard to our diplomatic service abroad as they are in regard to building up the industries of this country.

Now, the Government of Great Britain is wiser than we are in this respect. The English nation sees and realizes the importance of extending its foreign trade; and it acts accordingly. In order to illustrate the difference between the policies of the two countries in regard to the consular and diplomatic service, I desire to call attention to the contrast between the appropriations of the two countries for purposes such as are embraced in this bill.

The bill now before us appropriates, in gross, $1,190,885. This is for our whole consular and diplomatic service. Now, what do we find the Government of Great Britain appropriating in the year 1883, the last year of which I have any report? For that year Great Britain appropriated $2,769,658 for salaries in the diplomatic and consular service. Beyond this it should be borne in mind that the British Government constantly appropriates very large sums for the purpose of purchasing and maintaining offices, residences, telegraphic and mail connections, and other facilities in assisting the mercantile and manufacturing interests of Great Britain to extend their trade. More than that, Great Britain is constantly increasing her appropriations in this direction. Her appropriations for the consular service alone for the year 1883 were $1,290,000 against our appropriation of $1,190,000 for the whole diplomatic and consular service. Beside that, their consuls and consular agents collect large sums in the shape of fees.

Now what is the result of this? All over the world, in every trading country, wherever you find a mercantile center, you will find a representative of British interests, who is a competent man, thoroughly conversant with all the affairs pertinent to his position, who can afford to give his time to the service of the interests of his country, who is constantly alert, who is giving advice constantly to his home government how the trade of that country may be extended and improved, who is notifying them constantly of every step of every other nation which will tend to encroach upon their trade. And wherever an agent is found to be a valuable and successful man he is promoted in the service. It is the constant hope and expectation of these agents that, beginning as subordinates, they may work themselves up from agents to consuls and from consuls to legations. There is no limit except the limit of their ability to serve the country.

Whenever a change of administration occurs in Great Britain these men know that no change will take place in regard to their positions, but all over the world to-day every man in the diplomatic or consular service of the United States is packing his trunk and engaging his passage preparatory to returning home. [Laughter.] As long as this rule shall continue, this rule of poverty-pay and restrictions in regard to the outlay for this service and for its accommodation, we shall have poor service, and so long as we have poor service of this kind we shall have great difficulty in extending our trade.

I believe if gentlemen will examine this subject with care they would find it more far-reaching than they had supposed. The whole thing is in a nutshell. You can not get good service for a low price. I have before me the report of the consular and diplomatic service of Great Britain, and I will read a few of the items of appropriation. They appropriate for the diplomatic service a little over $1,000,000. They appropriate for the consular service, as I stated a short time ago, over a million and a quarter of dollars. They appropriate for subsidies to telegraph companies $165,000. They also appropriate large sums amounting to nearly $600,000 for wages of couriers, for postage, for fuel, for extra rent, for law charges, special missions, and for law advice.

Now, in view of this and in view of the importance of this subject to the material interests of this country, I submit it is no time for us, under the false sentiment of economy, to be reducing this consular and diplomatic appropriation. I find it is reduced in reality about $200,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does not the gentleman know the reduction in the bill is owing to a failure to carry out the survey of the border between Mexico and the United States? He will find but a small reduction in the salaries of the consular service.

Mr. CHACE. In the consular service there is a reduction.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is but a slight reduction.

Mr. CHACE. I have the items of reduction, which I will give the gentleman if he wishes to know them.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Reduction below the appropriation of last year?

Mr. CHACE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Very few instances and only small reductions.

Mr. CHACE. Not by any means. I will read some of them.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We have increased the salaries above those appropriated for last year in several instances. The reduction of the bill arises from a failure to appropriate money, for the reasons given by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], to make the survey, or rather to establish the monuments marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico.

Mr. CHACE. The gentleman from Illinois is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I do not wish to contradict him. I have not had time to analyze the bill as much as I would like, but I think the gentleman is mistaken. I will read a few of the items and then let him explain.

I find a reduction in clerks in the legation to Spain of $1,200. Am I right or wrong there?

Mr. WASHBURN. There is really an increase of $500 more than last year, as an assistant secretary of legation is provided.

Mr. CHACE. Why the reduction?

Mr. WASHBURN. The assistant secretary of legation has rendered that clerk unnecessary.

Mr. CHACE. Why then does not the committee vouchsafe the proper explanation of the matter?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The committee found it would be better to provide an assistant secretary of legation.

Mr. BURNES. I will state for the benefit of my friend from Rhode Island that he is laboring under a mistake. There is an actual increase of appropriation for the consular service.

Mr. CHACE. How much?

Mr. BURNES. I can tell the gentleman in a moment. I can not do it now.

Mr. CHACE. I find several other items here, among them the salary of the secretary of the legation at Turkey has been reduced $300. That is quite a matter of economy for this great country, no doubt.

The rent of legation buildings in China is stricken out entirely, amounting to $3,100. Why should that be so? Great Britain is constantly buying and building homes for her foreign legations, and takes the best care always of her consuls.

Mr. BURNES. Let me answer the gentleman. The $3,100 to which he alludes is an unnecessary, or, rather, I may say an abnormal, appropriation, differing from the appropriations for all other legations in the world; that is to say, we make no such appropriation for any other legation.

Mr. CHACE. That may be all very true, but it does not alter the fact that it ought to be done.

Mr. BURNES. But I hope the gentleman will confine himself, if he pleases, to the point that he is making. He is referring to the consular service, as I understand him. Now, this is not an appropriation for the consular service, but an appropriation for incidental expenses in connection with our diplomatic service.

Mr. CHACE. Why is not that for our consular service abroad? That is exactly the point that I am making.

Mr. BURNES. It has relation to the legation.

Mr. CHACE. That is true, but are not our foreign legations of service to the country, and should they not be upheld?

Mr. BURNES. Very well, when the gentleman comes to talk of the legations I shall have something to say on that subject; but when he is speaking of the consular service I hope he will not confound the two.

Mr. CHACE. Now, these are the items which I have selected at hap-hazard from this bill, and if I had time I am sure I could find numerous others of the same kind. But perhaps one item that the gentleman will deem applies to the consular service is this alteration or reduction of the pay of thirteen consular clerks, who are reduced from $1,200 to $1,000 per annum, making a reduction of $2,600.

Mr. BURNES. If the gentleman from Rhode Island will permit me a moment I will state that by inadvertence in making up this bill there should have been a subsequent section incorporated in it which would operate as a provision for the pay of these clerks.

My colleague from Illinois [Mr. HITT] will offer an amendment to the bill to increase their salaries to the statute law. They will be increased by amendment, and have all been provided for.

My HITT. I will offer an amendment at the proper time to carry out that suggestion.

Mr. CHACE. And I hope when the gentleman from Illinois, who is more competent I believe to deal with this subject than any other gentleman on the floor, when he does offer his amendment, it will be so comprehensive in its scope and character that it will not only remedy this pitiful little error but that it will embrace the whole subject.

I hope that it will take a step toward putting us in a respectable condition in regard to our consular and diplomatic service. I feel like saying unparliamentary things about this matter when I examine this bill. I think it is a great shame for a great nation to be so parsimonious. Here are thirteen clerks reduced $200 each. There have been a great many reductions made in wages since the last election which have been charged to the result of the election. I do not know whether gentlemen have done this for the same reason or not.

Here is a consul at Ningpo abolished, I believe. Is not that so?

Mr. BURNES. I will say that this would properly come up when we are reading the bill for consideration by sections, and thereby save time. But in regard to Ningpo, that is abandoned, not provided for, with the full knowledge and approbation of the State Department and all the members of the committee, of both parties, for reasons that may be given if desired.

Mr. CHACE. Here is a consul at Hankow reduced from $3,500 to $1,500, a reduction of $2,000.

Mr. RYAN. And our commerce increasing at that point.

Mr. CHACE. Yes; as suggested by my friend from Kansas, and our commerce increasing there very much. Here is another item, a large saving, the allowance of clerks at consulates, $80!

Again, you have stricken out $1,000 for interpreters in China and Japan. The interpreter at Bangkok reduced $300. I am reading this simply because the gentleman from Illinois stated that there was no reduction.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What was the reduction at Bangkok

Mr. CHACE. Three hundred dollars, I make it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. For what purpose?

Mr. CHACE. Interpreter.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Missouri can, I am satisfied, give the gentleman full information as to the necessity for that. I may say to him, however, that it is entirely unnecessary to have an interpreter at that point.

Mr. CHACE. And so on through sundry other items which I will not take the time to read now but reserve until we discuss the bill by sections. I only brought this up to answer the gentleman from Illinois at the time in regard to the matter of reduction to which I referred.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend from Rhode Island, if he will examine the bill further, will admit that we have left out an item of over $200,000 for the international boundary survey of the United States and Mexico, and that is the only reduction of the estimates of the Department.

Mr. CHACE. I understand there are certain other items which are very properly left out. But instead of this reduction there should have been an increase, and a very large increase. These salaries are all too small. We can not employ competent talent for the price we pay these consuls, and it is time for the Government of the United States to reverse its policy in regard to this important matter.

Mr. BURNES. I beg to say to my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] that I should like him some day to tell us why it is he prefers the commercial system of England as against the commercial system of this country. But that is unnecessary now. I beg to state to that gentleman, in all kindness, that when the American people have a commercial system similar to that of England we may not be driven to such straits of economy as to save $80 here, $500 there, $1,000 somewhere else, and the other pitiful sums to which he has alluded. But under the commercial system which we have at present and which has been in force in this country for many years we are compelled to economize with a due regard to that republican simplicity which should govern our legislation and which does govern our people.

If no other gentleman desires to speak I shall ask unanimous consent to close this debate.

Mr. WASHBURN. I desire to say a word in answer to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE]. The bill we are now considering appropriates substantially the same as the bill of last year. In some instances the amount has been increased and in some it has been decreased; but in the main it is substantially the same bill as was reported and passed last year.

So far as the expense of the consular service is concerned, I desire to say briefly that I agree with my friend from Rhode Island that no expense should be spared to extend our trade and commerce and to furnish markets for our different productions, both agricultural and manufacturing. I would spare nothing to make this thing complete and effective. But to do this I do not believe it is necessary to ape the governments of the Old World. I do not believe in order to have efficient consular service that it is necessary to ape England. With the same propriety you might call for enormous appropriations in the same line as those in England to support the royal family. Those appropriations do not add anything to the efficiency of the English Government. And I believe that to-day, with the moderate conservative appropriations made by this country, we have substantially in point of fact, and practically, as efficient a consular service as England has; and I hope it is not a part of the future of this country that it shall drift off into that kind of extravagant appropriations in connection either with our diplomatic or our consular service. I simply desire from this side of the House to enter a protest against this doctrine.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman, you can not measure the diplomatic or the consular service by any economy of the Government. You can not add to the commerce of the country by increasing salaries, nor take from the trade of the country by decreasing them. I am in favor of the consular service, and of making it efficient and strong; and I would relieve the American merchant and mariner from the payment of consular fees and pay every consul abroad a salary, so that the system shall not be a tax upon the trade of the country.

Neither those clothed with diplomatic agencies nor those in the consular service can increase your trade or your commerce. Nor can you by increasing salaries get American citizens better qualified for the discharge of duties abroad than those now in the service.

I say, Mr. Chairman, the American ministers abroad get salaries large enough now with a proper consideration of the economy of this Government. I would not have this great country fall into the rut of any foreign government in the payment of salaries. The minister of the United States in London receives a salary of $17,500. It is the same at Paris and at Berlin and at St. Petersburg. An American minister living at either of these great courts can maintain himself respectably and represent this country on his salary. For while he may not make the ostentatious display of the ministers or embassadors of other nations which pay higher salaries, still he will always be treated with profound respect either in the courts or in the social circles which he may frequent, if he never fails to remember that behind him stand sixty millions of freemen and the strongest government in the world.

And we will always find men qualified to fill the consular service if the Government is careful in the selection of the men. It is not the ministers who should be paid high salaries. It is the consuls who should be compensated to the full extent of their labors. We should have proper men in that service wherever the American merchant goes or the mariner goes, wherever we have trade and commerce and the exchange of commodities. We should pay the consuls ample and full and handsome salaries that the Government may have the service of men competent to fulfill their duties.

Mr. CHACE. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. CURTIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHACE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether or not he has ever understood that several of our ministers to St. Petersburg have left that post because the compensation was too small—because they could not afford it?

Mr. CURTIN. I do not know whether that is true or not. I was there for four years and was always treated with respect; and I will say to my friend from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] that I wore the plain dress of an American citizen—as plain as that of a Quaker from Rhode Island [laughter], and I lived on my salary.

Mr. BURNES. What was the salary at that time?

Mr. CURTIN. I went there upon a salary of $12,500.

Mr. BURNES. The salary is now $17,500.

Mr. CURTIN. After I had gone there some gentlemen in this House from the State of Pennsylvania, in a spirit creditable to the State and complimentary to the minister, refused to vote for the consular and diplomatic bill unless my salary should be raised to $17,500.

I always had my entrée at court. I had my place in social circles at St. Petersburgh. I lived on my salary; and I had enough. I did not go there to make money, but while there I tried to protect myself from the cold of that frozen region and to represent this great republican people.

I say the present salary of our minister to Russia is enough. I will not vote for a dollar more; but I will go with my friend from Rhode Island in voting money for the support and extension of our consular system, to encourage trade and commerce and to protect the American merchant and mariner. More than that, wherever our flag goes all over the world, wherever it flies in commerce and trade, I would have there for the protection of that commerce a gunboat of the American Navy, with a big gun upon it. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNES. I now ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed and that we proceed to the reading of the bill by paragraphs.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The following paragraphs were read:

For salary of consuls-general at Constantinople, Madrid, and Rome, at $2,000 each, $6,000.

For salaries of the agents and consuls-general at London, Paris, Havana, and Rio de Janeiro, at $6,000 each, $24,000.

For salaries of the consuls-general at Calcutta and Shanghai, at $5,000 each, $10,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to raise a question of order on the paragraph appropriating for salaries of consuls-general at Constantinople, Madrid, and Rome. My point of order is that the office of consul-general at Madrid is provided for in this bill without authority of previous legislation. In other words, this is new legislation on an appropriation bill. The appropriation law for this service for the present year provides for consuls-general at Constantinople and Rome at $2,000 each; the pending bill adds "Madrid" to the list at $2,000 per year.

Mr. BURNES. If the gentleman from Indiana will suspend a moment, I desire to suggest (though I am not familiar with these questions of order) that the paragraph against which this point of order is sought to be made had been read, and the Clerk was engaged in reading the second paragraph. I submit, therefore, that the gentleman from Indiana is too late in making his objection—for the first time, perhaps, in his life.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state in fairness to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that he was on the floor when the Clerk concluded the reading of the paragraph to which the point of order applies.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rose at the time for the purpose of making the point, but the Clerk continued the reading.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon the point of order I wish to state for the information of the Chair that the present law provides as follows:

For salaries of consuls-general at Constantinople and Rome, $2,000 each, $4,000.

This bill proposes to change that provision, so as to read:

For salary of consuls-general at Constantinople, Madrid, and Rome, at $2,000 each, $6,000.

In other words, a consul-general is now, without previous authority of law, authorized at Madrid.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will please state what the salary of this consular officer at Madrid has been heretofore.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have no consul-general at Madrid now provided for by law nor one provided for by law prior to this time. This office in its present classification is a new office, created by this appropriation bill.

Mr. BURNES. I venture to suggest in answer to my esteemed colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, that he is mistaken in saying that this consul-general is not provided for in any law. In the first place, a consulate is established by the action of the President and Senate. We have nothing to do in the establishment or abolition of consulates or legations. These, under the Constitution, are established by the act of the President with the assent of the Senate.

In this case we are not undertaking to make law in regard to this matter. We do not make law of this character. We simply appropriate in accordance with law made by the Executive and the Senate under the Constitution.

Under a law established by the action of the President, with the assent of the Senate, we have been appropriating year after year for this consul-general. But by oversight or for some other reason—no matter what—we failed to make the appropriation last year. This may be said to create a deficiency, and we might have been called upon to provide for this deficiency if the President had continued the consul-general at Madrid. Therefore it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, with my limited experience here, that as we have nothing to do with the making of the law establishing consuls, it can not be said we are changing any law or making any provision further than to appropriate the money for that which the law-making power has established by affirmative action.

Mr. HOLMAN. The only provision of the Constitution of the United States bearing on this subject is to be found on page 14 of the Manual, and I will send it up to the Clerk's desk to be read. It is the clause enumerating the powers of the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

Mr. HOLMAN. From that provision of the Constitution it will be seen that exactly the same powers are vested in the President of the United States with reference to foreign ministers, consuls-general, and other like officers as are provided in regard to judges of the Supreme Court and other like officers of the Government, "such as are provided for by law." I quote the language of the Constitution.

My friend from Missouri assumes the President of the United States has the power of appointment of foreign ministers and consuls under the Constitution of the United States without any preliminary legislation on the part of Congress, without legislative authority, and that all Congress has to do as to such public officers is merely to appropriate the money necessary to pay salaries. I submit that view is not and can not be correct, and that the President can not appoint a minister or consul-general except in pursuance with law. The law must not only provide the office but the salary.

It seems to me clear that no distinction has been made by the Constitution between a consul-general as an office under the Constitution and a judgeship in the Supreme Court. In both instances the President of the United States appoints where the office is created by law, and not otherwise; and whether it be a minister, consul-general, or judge of the Supreme Court, the office must be created "in pursuance of law." That is the language of the Constitution. The Constitution simply creates here, as my friend from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] suggests, the appointing power, but the creation of the office still rests with Congress.

Permit me to add further that the office of consul-general at Madrid has never existed, so far as I am informed, by express provision of law at any time.

Mr. BURNES. In the law for the year ending June 30, 1884, I find that appropriation was made for secretaries of legations and consuls-general at Vienna, Rome, and Constantinople at $3,000 each, and for secretary of legation and consul-general at Madrid $3,000. Now, this looks to me a little as though there was a law establishing a consul-general at Madrid.

Mr. HOLMAN. What does my friend read from?

Mr. BURNES. I read from the appropriation bill of last year.

Mr. HOLMAN. I had not observed that fact, and if it is true I concede, if this office was provided for and appropriated for during the present fiscal year, it is, according to former rulings, to be regarded as authorized by law for the time being.

Mr. BURNES. Here is the law which I hold in my hands.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then it is, according to the former rulings of the Chair, to be considered the law of the land for that year. But do I understand correctly? Do I understand the gentleman to say that the appropriation was made for the present fiscal year?

Mr. RYAN. No; he said it was the law for 1884.

Mr. BURNES. It is not the current law, but an appropriation in the law for 1884.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then it seems that by a former appropriation bill an appropriation was made for a secretary of legation and consul-general for a former year now already expired. The gentleman does not assume the office was created in any other way than by making an appropriation for it during a former fiscal year. It is not assumed that this office was ever created by other provision of law than an appropriation. As a legislative rule for that period, the current year, I concede an appropriation for an office is to have full force for the period named; but submit that a mere appropriation of money for an office for a given year, say last year or any preceding year, if afterward it shall be discontinued, does not perpetuate that office, for the office is not created by law, it is but a temporary provision; in other words, suppose it was shown that ten years ago an appropriation was made for a consul-general at Madrid, and that from then on until now no appropriation had been made, can it be argued there was any such office as consul-general existing by virtue of law?

I think I have heard the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] who now occupies the chair hold heretofore, when occupying the same position, on other bills, that where the office is to be created by specific law an appropriation made during a previous year can not be taken as creating such office so as under the rule to support an appropriation of money. There is no law now authorizing an appropriation of money for such an office as consul-general at Madrid. There was an appropriation for such an office combined with a secretaryship of legation, as my friend [Mr. BURNES] has shown, for a former fiscal year, but none for the present year. There is therefore no existing law which would justify an appropriation in accordance with the requirements of the rule of the House. In other words, there is not now and never has been, so far as we are informed, an independent provision of law creating the office of consul-general at Madrid.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, I understand that two years ago, as stated by the gentleman from Missouri, there was an appropriation for the consul-general at Madrid. There was at that time, therefore, some provision or some warrant of law for the appointment of a consular officer there. It now turns out that there was no appropriation made for this officer last year.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana on these facts if he understands that the failure to appropriate for the consul-general last year repealed whatever law there was in existence authorizing the appointment of such officer at Madrid?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think, sir, if it was an appointment of a consular officer simply by virtue of an appropriation, that it existed as such during the period for which the appropriation was made; that is to say, for the current year. It was simply a law for that year, and when that year terminated there was no law on the statute-books providing for the continuance of the office; it was the law of the year only.

Now, if my friend from Massachusetts will allow me a little further, I will call his attention to the Statutes at Large, which contain the provisions in regard to consuls-general. They are provided for, as the gentleman will find by reference to the statutes, in Great Britain, British America, British India, France, Cuba, Mexico, the North German Union, Italy, the Turkish Dominions, and China.

These are the consuls-general provided for by statutory enactment, and this provision has gone into and become a part of the Revised Statutes of the United States. It will be observed that this consul-general at Madrid has not been provided for in this statute, and on the strength of that examination I assumed that such an office had not heretofore existed, my attention not being called to the provision in the bill of 1884 referred to by the gentleman from Missouri. I submit, however, I repeat, that the office existed only by virtue of an appropriation bill; that it was simply a law for the current year, or it was not a subsisting law which would operate from time to time until repealed.

Mr. LONG. Does the gentleman claim that the mere insertion of a clause in an appropriation bill providing for the salary of an officer constitutes or creates the office?

Mr. HOLMAN. For the period covered by the appropriation, the current year, undoubtedly.

Mr. LONG. That would apply to every office provided for in this bill for which a salary is appropriated.

Mr HOLMAN. It does; that is the very thing you are doing. You are legislating on this bill by providing a salary and thus creating an office, at least for the time being, but no more. If this bill should become a law, undoubtedly each office named would be a subsisting office, to be filled by appointment for the current year. The bill provides in effect that these officers shall be continued in service during that period, that is, the period for which you appropriate. So, if you provide a salary for the consul-general at Madrid you create the office for the time, and the President might appoint an officer there; but such an appointment would be subject to the provisions of the appropriation bill, and extend only during the current year. I admit that if the Revised Statutes and current general laws, in the classification of the consuls-general and the consuls and other foreign representatives, had made provision for this officer at Madrid, then it would have been a statutory provision; but the facts of the matter are that the statutes are silent on that subject, and the only provision is that incidental one in an appropriation bill of two years ago, which exhausted itself with the then current year.

The Chair will discover, I think, that except on a mere appropriation bill there has not been any legislation on this subject at all since the present Revised Statutes came into force, and it was upon the Revised Statutes, which designates the foreign officers of this Government and their salaries, that I made the suggestion; that is to say, that there is no law except the law of the current year, or rather an appropriation bill of a former year, providing for the consul-general at Madrid. Now that appropriation bill has ceased to be longer in force. It was an appropriation for the year 1884, and has ceased to be in force as a legislative provision, not being continuous in its character.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the gentleman from Indiana, he claims that the office exists only by force of the appropriation for the current year. If that be the case, then the office expires with the appropriation for the current year. If that be the case, further, every consulship that is provided for in this bill is a new office created by the appropriation bill of this year, and the point of order lies against every such appropriation. That is the reductio ad absurdum.

Now, the fact is that this office had been provided for in former years by law. Two years ago there certainly must have been warrant of law for the establishment of a consul-generalship at Madrid. Last year there was a failure to appropriate. That failure to appropriate did not repeal the law any more than the appropriation this year would create it. In other words, a simple appropriation to pay the consul can neither create nor repeal the office; and therefore I can not see that this provision is obnoxious to the point of order, because it does not make a law at all. It simply provides a salary for the payment of an officer who has heretofore existed by virtue of law.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. But it creates an office.

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend from New York will permit me a moment, I desire to send to the Chair for his information in relation to what is the existing law on this subject the Revised Statutes, specifying where consul-generals shall be established to represent this Government.

Mr. BURNES. Referring back to the argument of the gentleman upon the Constitution, I desire to call his attention to the fact, and your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact, that the fathers of the Constitution were groping in great darkness from the adoption of the Constitution until 1856, because I undertake to say, after limited investigation, however, that you will not find any consulate or any legation was established from the time of the adoption of the Constitution until the year 1856.

So the Presidents, from Washington down to Mr. Buchanan, were constantly nominating, and the Senate confirming, and there was no law in existence defining or creating these offices. Now, why did they do that? I say that it was simply from their construction of this provision of the Constitution, which provides that the President shall appoint—

All other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law.

That has no reference to the class of officers named in the first subdivision of this provision of the Constitution. When you come to construe this provision of the Constitution you will find that this qualification has reference to other offices and not to those offices which were never established until 1856.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think my friend from Missouri is clearly right. The last clause of this provision of the Constitution relates only to such offices not enumerated as may be established by law, and has no reference to those referred to in the preceding clause.

Mr. HAMMOND. Does the gentleman from Illinois mean that the President of the United States could nominate a judge of the Supreme Court before Congress had organized a supreme court?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No, sir.

Mr. HAMMOND. That is in the same clause.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I was about to give the explanation that this stands on a different footing. The appointment of a consul or embassador is the exercise of the treaty-making power of the President, and it stands upon a different footing from the appointment of any executive officer or judicial officer or any officer whose appointment is prescribed by law.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman read the whole clause?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have read it. It has already been read to the House.

I make this point, in addition to the point made by my friend from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], that the power of the appointment of embassadors and other public ministers and consuls is the exercise of the treaty-making power of the President. Congress could not prevent the President from appointing a representative of the United States Government abroad if Congress failed to appropriate his salary.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois know of any treaty between the United States and Spain providing for a consul-general at Madrid?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No, sir; but the Constitution of the United States has conferred upon the President full power to appoint such representatives of the United States Government abroad as in his judgment he may deem proper.

Mr. HOLMAN. By this provision?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. By this provision of the Constitution.

Mr. HOLMAN. By this provision of the law?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. He is empowered to appoint such representatives, be they embassadors or consuls-general or other agents of the Government, consular or diplomatic. I wish to throw in the suggestion that this stands on a different footing from the appointment of the other officers of the Government.

Mr. WASHBURN. It appears to me the logic of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] is irresistible. There was a law in 1884 authorizing that appropriation, or the appropriation itself created the law. Certainly there was a law at that time. Now, that law has never since been repealed. The fact of failure to make an appropriation last year in compliance with the law certainly could not operate as in effect to repeal it.

Now, we have had for years and years an appropriation for a consul-general at Cairo. But the last Congress failed to make an appropriation. The gentleman did not make the point of order in that case, as he certainly should have done, because it would be a parallel case.

Mr. HOLMAN. What case?

Mr. WASHBURN. That of the consul-general of Cairo.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not make the point of order on that.

Mr. WASHBURN. That was the same case as here. The law under which that appropriation has been made every year to pay the consul-general at Cairo certainly was not repealed because we failed to make the appropriation in accordance with law. And it seems to me this is a parallel case.

Mr. BURNES. I desire now, that the Chair may have time to investigate this point, to move that the committee rise.

Mr. BAYNE. Is the point of order pending?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BAYNE. The point of order will be considered in the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course.

Mr. BAYNE. Is not this debate directed to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Entirely so.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to say a word on the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. Can the gentleman not say it when the bill again comes up?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not see how you are going to limit debate on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order, but will submit the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. BURNES. I withdraw that motion.

Mr. BAYNE. The motion being withdrawn, I desire to say a word. I want to enter, here and now, a solemn protest, and an earnest one, against the assumption that the President may appoint any officer without the authority of Congress. I want to stand upon the declaration that this is a government of law, and that it is a government regulated by the will of the people, and that the will of the people must be reduced to law before the President can act with reference to a single appointment or a single duty pertaining to his office. As I read the law, and as I have reviewed hastily the acts of Congress on this subject, the appropriation for this office at Madrid is liable to the point of order. because there is no law now in existence creating that consulship.

Mr. WASHBURN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how the appropriation was made in 1884 if there was no law?

Mr. BAYNE. You can make the appropriation now if nobody raises the point of order against it, or you can make it now if the Chair overrules the point of order and the Treasury will pay it. But I do not feel because the thing was done last year or the year before that it is right now.

The fact is, there is not now a solitary law on the statute-book authorizing the President to make this appointment. We have presented upon this appropriation bill new legislation creating this office of consul-general at Madrid. There is no way of escaping this conclusion.

It was assumed here a little while ago by some gentleman that the President, by virtue of his authority under the Constitution, has power to make these appointments. But, sir, the law has never been so regarded. The act of 1856 enumerates various places at which consuls are authorized; and a provision contained in the Supplement to the Revised Statutes enumerates specifically the places at which consuls-general, consuls, and commercial agents shall be appointed and what their salaries shall be. By the act of 1856 a discretionary power was vested in the President with reference to changing the grade of a consul to a consul-general, or a consul-general to a consul; a commercial agent to a consul, or a consul to a commercial agent. This discretion was vested in the President with reference to fixing the grade of these particular officers established by law. But we did not confer upon the President power to go further and say that he would create a new office by establishing a consulate at Madrid or some other point. Such an exercise of authority by the President was never authorized by law. I submit, therefore, that the provision embraced in this bill is liable to the point of order, and the point ought to be sustained by the Chair, because there is no law authorizing the office of a consul-general at the place designated.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say a word on this point of order, because I regard it as very important I believe that when there is inserted in an appropriation bill an item providing for a salary to be paid to any officer the effect of that provision is to create that officer; and, on the other hand, the moment you refuse to make an appropriation for the office, it having been created only for the year, the refusal to make such an appropriation is tantamount to a repeal of the statute creating the office. The appropriation in the first instance having authorized the existence of the office for only one year, the office ceases to exist when that statute expires and Congress fails to make a new appropriation.

Now, this is not an unimportant question. I believe there has not been made by any chairman of any Committee of the Whole a ruling in favor of retaining in an appropriation bill legislation of this kind. Certainly, with some little experience in these matters, I do not remember a case in which upon an appropriation bill Congress has authorized the creation of an office where the point of order has been raised.

I have said that I regard this as a question of a good deal of importance. I believe that the extension of our consular and diplomatic service should be by general law. The party about to go out of power has been held to this rule; and I object to the establishment of any precedent by which the party about to come into power shall create offices in any other way. I only make this remark, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of impressing upon your mind the importance of this question. If we can by new legislation upon an appropriation bill create this office of consul-general at Madrid, we can do the same thing all along the line—in reference, for instance, to officers in the Territories, &c. Such has not been the practice; and I believe this point of order is well taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will detain the committee but a moment further upon the point of order. Looking back through our legislation, a great many instances may be found in which we authorized ministers to foreign countries by a simple appropriation, notably in the cases of South America, Greece, and other countries to which we formerly accredited ministers. But because in former years we appropriated money for a minister, for instance to Greece or to any of the various South American States, could it be assumed now, after the lapse of years, that there is a subsisting law upon which an appropriation might be made? And if an appropriation can not be made under our present rules on the strength of such former legislation, even though the legislation were contained in an appropriation bill for the current year, can such an appropriation be made on the basis of a law which has already expired?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does not the gentleman recollect that several years ago Congress refused to make an appropriation to pay the salary of the minister to Greece?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yet he was continued in office.

Mr. HOLMAN. But we did not abolish the office. The office was created by the very law now lying before the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not think that is the reason the minister was continued in office. He was continued simply because the President claimed the right to send a representative to that country, although no provision had been made for the payment of his salary.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no. The law creating that office was not repealed until afterward.

The CHAIRMAN. This point of order is to be decided by reference to the Constitution of the United States, the Revised Statutes, and the rules of the House. It is provided, in a part of article 2 of the Constitution, that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, embassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

The Chair finds in the Revised Statutes no provision for the office now under discussion. Consequently, as the Chair believes, no provision is made by the general law of the land for this appropriation. The fact that Congress made an appropriation for this office in 1883 and did not do so in 1884 raises a presumption that it was only a temporary appointment. The only law to guide the Chair in the application of Rule XXI to the present case is the appropriation bill for the current year. If provision had been made for this office in the appropriation bill for the year ending June 30, 1885, the Chair would have been compelled to hold that the office was authorized under existing law. But clause 3 of Rule XXI provides:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

All right to object to such features having been reserved in the House, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. Lockwood, late nominee of the Equal Rights party for President, asking that the ballots cast for her in the several States shall be counted, and that the electoral vote of the State of Indiana be adjudged to her. I am a little uncertain as to the proper committee to which the petition should be sent. I do not know but it would be proper to send it to the presiding officer of the Senate as a special committee, by reason of his constitutional relation to that question and his eminent fitness to deal with it; but, on the whole, I will move that it be referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a petition of the board of supervisors of Saint Croix County, Wisconsin, praying that Congress may enact a law providing that railroads engaged in the transportation of commodities from one State to another shall not charge more for shorter distances than the same company charges for a longer distance; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Cigar-makers' Union of Eau Claire, Wis., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PENDLETON presented a memorial of the Cigar-workers' Mutual Protective Union of Cincinnati; a memorial of the Cigar-packers' Union of Cincinnati, and a memorial of the Seed Leaf Tobacco Board of Trade of Cincinnati, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5479) to prevent unlawful occupancy of the public lands, to report it with sundry amendments. I will state that at a very early opportunity I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to have the bill considered. The principal amendment reported by the committee is the re-establishment of the vitality of the law of 1870, authorizing the President of the United States to use the civil and military forces, if necessary, to remove illegal obstructions upon the public domain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2482) to amend sections 1 and 2 of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the sale of timber lands in the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, and in Washington Territory," approved June 3, 1878, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DOLPH. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 100) for the relief of certain preemption and homestead settlers in California, to report it adversely.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Let the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the Committee.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 847) for the relief of Francis B. Van Hoesen, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2487) to establish an additional land district in Dakota, reported it with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 2522) to provide for the purchase of the two canals known as the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company Canal and the Lake Superior Ship-Canal Railway and Iron Company Canal, being the water communication across Keweenaw Point, Lake Superior, from Keweenaw Bay to Lake Superior by way of Portage River and Lake, in the State of Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 2523) to increase pensions of widows, minor children, and dependent parents from eight to twelve dollars per month, and providing that muster into service shall be prima facie evidence of soundness at enlistment; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2524) granting a pension to Harriet A. B. Corts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 2525) for the relief of Ann Annis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON introduced a bill (S. 2526) to increase the pension of widows and minor children; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to state, in moving the reference of the bill to the Committee on Pensions, that it embraces but one of the subjects of the bill introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL]. I have therefore thought it proper to introduce a separate bill. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 109) authorizing the loan of certain flags and bunting to the committee on inauguration ceremonies; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COUNTING OF THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives the 11th of February, 1885, at 12 o'clock noon, pursuant to the requirement of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

PUBLIC POLICY OF CONFEDERATE STATES EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). "Concurrent or other resolutions" being in order, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] on the 8th of January, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if in his opinion it be not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate a historical statement concerning the public policy of the executive department of the Confederate States during the late war of the rebellion, reported to have been lately filed in the War Department by General William T. Sherman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he thinks there is anything contained in the paper to which his resolution refers requiring or rendering necessary any action upon the part of the Senate; and if he does not, I desire to inquire of him why the Senate should ask to have the paper communicated to it.

I called at the War Department on Saturday and examined the paper. It is a somewhat voluminous argument upon the part of General Sherman of his side of a personal issue made a short time since through the newspapers between himself and Mr. Jefferson Davis, the argument being based upon various records and documents, most of which have already gone into history—all of them, with perhaps the exception of one or two, and those documents are contained in the paper referred to and now a public record in the War Department, to which the Bureau of War Records has full access, and from which paper that bureau can draw the documents referred to if there be such as have not already gone into history.

I have no objection to the broadest publication of every fact that the paper contains; but, unless the Senator thinks the paper contains some matter demanding the action of the Senate, I ask him why the Senate should ask to have a copy of the document sent here and assume the simple form of an executive document to be pigeon-holed and slumber here forever? If there is in the opinion of the Senator any action that the Senate ought to take in respect to that paper, then I shall interpose not the slightest objection to the adoption of his resolution and the transmittal of the paper to the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. When I first heard that such a paper had been filed by General Sherman I was told there was some new historical statement or document contained therein. I also on Saturday went to the War Department and looked the paper over. There is a very important and a very interesting paper in that communication which has never been before the public, and which, undoubtedly, will be exceedingly interesting to every man who cares anything about the history of the late war. It was on the supposition that there were such statements and papers in it that I submitted the resolution. I find there is at least one such document, whether there is anything more or not. I presume there are facts and allegations there that are new beside those in the document to which I refer, but there is one official document that is entirely new.

When I offered the resolution I desired to have this document in some authentic shape. I thought probably the whole matter would get into the newspapers some time or other, but very likely, being a long document, only in the way of extracts and mutilations, taking out that which the correspondent of the newspaper might think more interesting reading than any other portion; wherefore, I desired to have the entire document in an authentic shape from the Government Printing Office as a very important part of the history of the country. I still think it is worth while to do that, not for the sake of reviving any controversy or anything of that sort or taking any part in any personal quarrel, but because of its historical importance.

The Senator from Tennessee says very truly that the document is now in the archives of the War Department and will eventually come under the consideration of the officer who is preparing the Rebellion Records. That is true, but the paper I refer to pertains to the very closing year and months of the war, and will not come out in the Rebellion Records under two or three or four years; and as it is not a formidable pamphlet to print, I presume making twenty-five or thirty pages of the size of the ordinary miscellaneous document, I hope the Senator will make no objection to our printing it.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall not be understood as objecting to the printing if the Senator desires that it shall be printed in the form of an executive document. I think it is a somewhat unsafe if not a dangerous precedent. The United States Senate is in no sense a bureau for the collection or perpetuation of historical facts or a bureau for the purpose of printing history. We have a bureau organized for that purpose. The paper referred to is now on file under the very fingers of that bureau, and perhaps it is, or ought to be, on file in its pigeon-holes.

Now, exactly why we should ask for the sending to the Senate of every paper that we may regard as of historic interest in order that it may be printed as an executive document and encumber the files of the Senate, if it be upon a subject that no Senator will say demands the action of the Senate, I doubt very much the policy; and if it were not for considerations that I do not care to open or to even refer to here, I should very earnestly protest against the making of such a precedent where no higher object is even suggested by the Senator asking that the paper be brought here than the one he does suggest, simply in order that we may print it in the form of an executive document when it is already a public record in the archives of the Government and in the hands of the historical bureau, and will go into history in its proper place and through the proper channel. I doubt very much the propriety, but I shall interpose no objection if the Senator insists upon the adoption of his resolution.

Mr. VEST. I very much regret the introduction of this resolution, not that as an ex-confederate I have the slightest objection to the largest amount of publicity to the political history of the late Confederate States, but I regret it for the reason that it places the Senate of the United States in the attitude of becoming indirectly at least a party to a personal controversy in the public papers of the country. The Senate of the United States has over and over again refused to make investigation even when a member of this body rose and called attention to libels upon him in the public press; but the rule of the Senate has been, and I presume it will be adhered to in the future, to remand any Senator who has complaint of this sort to the remedies furnished by the laws of the country and by an appeal to public opinion through the same medium of communication by which the libel was inflicted.

My feeling toward General Sherman is personally of the kindest description. He is my constituent and I believe my personal friend; I have every reason to think so; but it is simple justice (and justice to a man of whom there may be great diversity of opinion, but who is still entitled to a fair and honest trial before this or any other tribunal) to say that the passage of this resolution commits the Senate of the United States, indirectly at least, to the side of this personal controversy, which belongs to General Sherman and his friends.

Without going into the history of this matter, I state what is known to the whole country, that in October last, at a meeting of Frank P. Blair Post, No. 1, of the Grand Army of the Republic, in the city of Saint Louis, General Sherman stated that the late war, or the last war, originated in a systematic conspiracy, and that he had seen a letter, he is reported to have said, from Mr. Davis to a gentleman once the governor of a confederate State and now a member of this body, which stated that Jefferson Davis as president of the late confederacy had threatened to coerce any one of the Southern States which attempted to secede from the confederacy, thereby giving the lie to his expression of belief in State rights, and falsifying the very issue upon which the Southern States had gone into the war.

This statement was published and wide-spread through the newspapers of the country. Mr. Davis responded by stating that no such letter had ever existed, and that he challenged its production, and in the absence of that letter he pronounced it a deliberate slander. The issue was made up, and General Sherman publicly avowed to all persons who approached him that he proposed to make his answer to Mr. Davis through the War Department at Washington. That answer has been made. It has been made in the shape of a letter not to a member of this body and late the governor of a confederate State, but a letter from Alexander H. Stephens, vice-president of the confederacy, to Herschel V. Johnson, in which he expressed his distrust and suspicion of Mr. Davis and his ultimate designs in the war. Another one of these documents to which I presume the Senator from Connecticut refers is a message sent by Jefferson Davis to the confederate congress, or to the confederate senate in secret session, in which he recommended the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Both these documents have been published in the public press; they are found in the New York papers of yesterday, and the letter of Mr. Stephens to Mr. Johnson is also found in the Washington city papers of to-day.

Is it fair, is it right, is it manly now, when Mr. Davis can not be heard upon this floor unless it be through the mouth of some one who chooses to espouse and advocate his side of this controversy—is it right now to use the Government of the United States and its instrumentalities in a personal controversy, no matter what may be its merits, no matter what may be the position of the parties to it?

Sir, there can come no good from this investigation. Its only result will be—I charge it not as the object—to arouse the bitter memories of the war. It will add nothing to the political history of the Confederate States. Jefferson Davis to-day is an old man, broken in fortune and in health, and living among the people who honor and love him. If the resolution be passed it will necessitate, upon my part at least, the public avowal (I was a member of the Confederate States senate) that I opposed with all my force measures which were advocated by Mr. Davis and which I thought were not for the public welfare of the confederacy, and it will necessitate the avowal also that I believe, as an overwhelming majority of the Southern people who risked and lost all in that terrible struggle to-day believe and will always believe, that Jefferson Davis was as true and loyal to the cause which he espoused as ever was wife to husband, as ever was religious votary to the God he worshiped. He made mistakes unquestionably, and who would not? Met and surrounded by unparalleled difficulties and dangers, arrayed against him the highest talent of the Confederate States in the persons of political leaders, who would not have been mistaken in the terrible ordeal through which he passed? But I should hold myself to be recreant and dastard, false to the memories of the past, all that is left to us, false to my hopes in the future as an honorable man, if I did not state here and now that General Sherman is mistaken in the assertion that the people of the Confederate States did not sympathize with their leader in that terrible conflict. I say nothing of its merits, I say nothing of its history, I simply make an avowal here in behalf of an absent man, who has suffered much, whatever may be thought of his past history, and who is entitled to this avowal from one who shares with him to-day the responsibility of that struggle and its results.

Sir, this investigation can do no good, it adds nothing to history. There are before us to-day great issues pressing upon us in the short time left of the life of this Congress; and in the language of a distinguished lecturer, a resident of this city, we have no more use for these personal opinions of General Sherman, for these documents which are already on file in the archives of the Government, than a shroud has for a pocket.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I was absent when this resolution was called up, and my object in rising now is not to asperse any individual, and certainly not General Sherman. I shall have accomplished my object when I say that this is purely a private and personal controversy between private citizens of this country, and I can see no occasion for the intervention of the Senate in the way this resolution proposes.

As I understand the controversy, General Sherman has made certain charges against Mr. Davis, made them not in an official communication, made them in a speech to his comrades. Mr. Davis replied, denying the charge. General Sherman has filed, as I understand—and I speak from the press—in the War Department what he conceives to be the proof of his charge. I do not see what the Senate has to do with this question. It is a matter that must be decided by the public whether or not General Sherman is right; but I do not think that this Senate in this private and person quarrel ought to lend its influence or its aid to the one side or the other. It is for these reasons, sir, that I oppose the passage of the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I do not quite understand that this is a contest between two private citizens of this country. I do not quite understand by what authority Mr. Davis is called a citizen of the United States. I think there is something for Mr. Davis to do and for Congress to do before Mr. Davis can be brought by his friends or anybody else into equality of relation of citizenship with General Sherman; he has some application to make to Congress, he has some action by Congress to get before he can be restored to the position in which the Senator from Mississippi has placed him as a citizen of the United States entitled to the protection of our laws or the rights of citizenship.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I presume it is unnecessary for me to answer the legal position taken by the Senator from Michigan. Although Mr. Davis may suffer or lie under the disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment, he is still a citizen, subject to the laws of the United States. I have not heard before that the fourteenth amendment had the effect, or was designed to have the effect, to destroy the citizenship of any person who came within its purview. But however that may be, the suggestions that I made would be just as potential whether the Senator from Michigan regards Mr. Davis as a citizen or not. It is certainly a quarrel between private persons, private individuals, and I can not see that there is any propriety in the Senate taking official action upon one side or the other.

If it be asserted that the documents which General Sherman has filed in the War Department ought to be known by the public, then I answer that they are already known. I saw them all published this morning in one of the papers of this city. I do not see how their being published through the agency of the Senate can give them more force or more effect than they now already have.

Allow me, Mr. President, to say again I will express no opinion here on the merits of this controversy. I have an opinion and a very decided one, but I do not believe that it accords with my duty to my constituents, to the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, or to the good of this whole country, that I should express that opinion. But whatever opinion I may entertain, whatever opinion the Senator from Michigan may entertain, can not be enforced or strengthened by the action of the Senate. That controversy between these two eminent men must go down to history and must be settled as all other questions are settled, according to the truth and the merits of the case; and allow me to say, sir, that with that judgment I shall be perfectly satisfied. I have no fear that anything in that judgment will be adverse to the honor or patriotism of Jefferson Davis.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have spoken once. Can I speak again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This resolution is not under the eighth rule

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not assent to the proposition that the proposed action of the Senate is an interference in a mere private quarrel or taking sides in a mere private quarrel. I do not know, nor for my present purpose do I care, how much of personal animosity there may be between Mr. Davis and the distinguished general. It has nothing to do with what I am after now. I desire to get in official form laid before the country a very interesting statement from a great general in the war, now on the retired-list, who has lately been the head of the Army, which statement contains in it information, and arguments if you choose, that I consider important to a proper understanding of all the great questions that have lately divided the country. Personally I do not care about the expression committing me to the side of General Sherman, for I am on that side with the greatest pleasure, with all my powers of mind and body. I believe him right in the personal and in the political and in the military side of that controversy; and now I am seeking to add authentically to the historic knowledge of the country. I do not care to go into the details of the communication, though since I offered the resolution I have read it.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to put a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply desire to ask if the Senator thinks from what he knows of the paper under discussion that there is any action the Senate can take if the paper comes here except to print it as an executive document?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know what the other Senators might say about that, nor do I know that it is an essential question. We have not been in the habit always of weighing the value of a request for communications from the Executive Departments by the consideration whether we were going to take any action upon them or not. We desire the information. In a certain and broad sense you may say this historical statement might have to do with the action of the Senate. I do not think it would, but I do not think that is essential. We have a right to any information concerning the war or any thing that has happened since that we may think of value to us as legislators or to the public.

Mr. HARRIS. Unquestionably. There is no question about that, nor would any one, I imagine, desire to suppress a single fact or a single paper referred to in the communication submitted by General Sherman; but my point is, that it is already in the archives of the Government. It is already as authentic as it can be made; it is already public not only in the newspapers, but filed in one of the Executive Departments and within the hand of the War Records Office for whatever use history may demand or it may be proper that it should be appropriated to. If the Senate proposes to take no action except to print it, the printing by the Senate will give no additional authenticity or additional publicity to the paper referred to. It seems to me the action proposed is wholly unnecessary.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think it would add an additional authenticity, it certainly would an additional publicity. In that paper is a statement which establishes beyond all question to my mind the fact that there was a deliberate conspiracy in this city of Washington as early as the beginning of 1861 by which certain Senators decided upon a confederate government, upon the location of its headquarters at Montgomery, and appointed a committee of Messrs. Davis and Slidell to attend to this, the agreement being made that other Senators should remain here to prevent any legislation that might interfere with the success of the secession.

This is not a matter of personal quarrel between Mr. Davis and General Sherman, any further than it is true that many millions of us had a personal quarrel for four years, a personal quarrel of the most terrible character; and everything that pertains to that war and that may hurt the feelings of one man or another on this side or the other is not to be called a personal matter because his feelings were engaged in it.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Connecticut. How will this paper be published among the war records? This is a recent paper in the Department, and it can not be covered by the authority under which those records are published. If published at all, it must be published by some order such as the one the Senator has submitted.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think that is true of the paper as a whole, although there is one document in it, a message from Mr. Davis to the confederate congress, that might come within the records to be compiled.

Mr. DAWES. All the rest is outside of the functions of that publication.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the Senator is correct in that.

Mr. VEST. I only wish to supplement what I said before by a single remark. General Sherman states in this paper that it is a contribution to the war records; that he desires it should go down to history as a portion of the political history of the confederacy. I wish to call the attention especially of the Senator from Connecticut to this single fact, which it seems to me determines the nature of this paper and whether it is a portion of a personal controversy or not: When Mr. Davis distinctly and emphatically denied that he had ever written any such letter as General Sherman stated he had seen and read and challenged its production, General Sherman stated that he would make his reply to Mr. Davis through the War Department at Washington. This is then a reply to the letter of Mr. Davis, and, as a matter of course, is part and parcel of the personal controversy between them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, as the yeas and nays have been called for on this resolution by the Senator from Connecticut, I think that it would be well that I should state my reasons for opposing it.

The Senator from Missouri has already informed the Senate, as they have been informed through the public prints, that this is a controversy between two gentlemen, both of whom were formerly members of this Government, holding distinguished positions, one Secretary of War and the other holding the position of General of the Army. A controversy unfortunately arose between them, possibly by some misrepresentation in its outset, as to the conduct of one of these gentlemen in the management of the affairs of a government which has passed out of existence and has no longer any recognition whatever except in history.

A controversy arose between them which found its way into the newspapers, an acrimonious controversy, one that was unpleasant in every respect, not agreeable I dare say to the general sentiment of the people of the United States, having no beneficial effect upon the future prosperity of this country, out of which there is no prospect of any advancement of the public good. It was the disposition, I think, of the press and the people of the United States to allow these gentlemen to have this matter out between themselves, without their becoming very much involved in it. It was stated, however, that one of these gentlemen, because of his merely nominal attachment at present to the Army of the United States, would take occasion to make a report, somewhat historical in its nature I suppose, to the Department of War, and that he would ask that that report should be taken as his defense against what Mr. Davis had had to say about General Sherman.

General Sherman assumes that because he has a nominal connection with the Army of the United States he has access to the War Department for the purpose of conducting his private quarrels. There is nothing public in this quarrel except its publicity and the fact that it relates to some matters that were once public, once matters of public concern, but are no longer so. Take out of it these elements, and it is particularly a private quarrel between two private gentlemen.

Now, sir, what shall we do after this paper has been ordered by the Senate of the United States and printed and made an executive document? Shall we deny to Jefferson Davis, in the name of common humanity, the right to make his statement and send it to the War Department and have it sent to the Senate of the United States in the same form? For while it may be true that one of these citizens is under a disability in respect of his civil rights and powers, it is not true that he is any less a man than General Sherman because of that. While it may be true that he is under the reprobation of a very large portion of the people of the United States because of his connection with the rebellion, it is none the less true that he is yet beloved by millions in the United States. While it may be that he was actively concerned against the Government of the United States in open warfare, and as the president of the confederacy during the time of the rebellion and the terrible struggles that were made between that and the Government of the United States, it is not true that he was any more particularly the enemy of the United States than I was or than many Senators on this floor to-day were.

We are here representing sovereign States; we are here by the consent of the Constitution of this country; we are here by the action of State Legislatures; we are here by the votes of this body seating us as Senators; we are here exercising powers equal to those exercised by any men on this floor; and we are here to stay. Now, sir, how could we be called upon to vote that Jefferson Davis should have no chance to reply through the War Department to this accusation of General Sherman through the War Department? What connection has General Sherman with the Army of the United States to-day that authorizes him to make reports to that Department to become reports of an official character? He is a retired Army officer. Captain Armes in this city has just as much right to make his reports and report his private correspondence and quarrels with officers, if he ever had any, to the War Department, and have them brought before the Senate as papers of an official character or papers that may find their way into the rebellion records, as General Sherman has.

It is true General Sherman was a much greater man than Captain Armes, held very much more important and influential positions; but they are both retired officers of the Army of the United States, and the Senate of the United States would stultify itself to make a distinction between those two men. But you would do it in a moment if Captain Armes should undertake to thrust into the War Department some quarrel which he may have had with some officers of the United States Army, or with Belknap, in whose impeachment he was very efficient, and for which reason Captain Armes was no longer in favor. If he were to push his statement of his interference with that matter and of Belknap's conspiracy with other people, Senators if you please, in respect to the abuse of the powers of the office he held then as the director of the War Department of the United States, you would refuse to receive it, and you would do it simply because Armes was not an important man. That would be all.

Now, sir, are we required to take this ground? Are we so much men-worshipers and are we so much men-haters, too, as that we should receive from General Sherman because of his great eminence and ability as a soldier his statement of what occurred in a government that we have had no connection with as a government here except to fight it, and then we can turn around and refuse to receive the defense or plea of the man thus assailed through the Senate or by the Senate of the United States, whichever you choose to have it? When you have received this communication and put it among your executive documents you have given to it the stamp of your approval, and you will cut off Jefferson Davis from any right to make a defense against it. That will be the attitude.

Now, Mr. President, do not let us get into that condition. This is an unfortunate movement. There seems to be some disposition even to make it a party movement. Why, sir, the Democratic party of the United States can not be involved in this; but if the Democratic party of the United States are compelled to take ground about it, they will certainly take the ground that you shall treat all men alike, and that when the Senate of the United States, this august body, undertakes to call for information which may have the effect to wound the character or the reputation of any man in the United States he shall have an equal right to reply. We will not confer upon him the right to reply; we will shut our doors against this. It will be said that he is not a citizen of the United States, and he is not entitled to be heard by the Senate of the United States in any respect; that he is fit for nothing on earth but to be abused. We will indorse the statement made by General Sherman by putting it among our files, and we will close our doors to a reply from Jefferson Davis.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, whenever any question arises in which Jefferson Davis is involved the Democratic party can always be found on the side of Jefferson Davis. I have heard the Senator from Alabama repeatedly air the same sentiments he has expressed to-day.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I should like him to present one occasion in which I have ever alluded to him. Now as a matter of history I wish to know it.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Alabama says he would like specifically to have some reference made to the time when he as a member of the Democratic party has indorsed Jefferson Davis. There never has been an occasion in debate in this body, and the occasions have been frequent since I have been a member of it, when the Senator from Alabama and his associates have not always taken sides with Jefferson Davis, always indorsed him, always approved his course, and, as they have done to-day, risen in their places and declared that there was nothing in his record that would convince posterity that he was not a man of honor and a patriot; yes, a man of honor and a patriot! And the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Missouri take occasion to inform the Senate of the United States that there are millions of people to-day who love Jefferson Davis, to whom Jefferson Davis is endeared by the memory of common hardships and common privations and common calamities.

Mr. President, we have just witnessed the spectacle of the election of a President of the United States by the votes of men who declare to-day that Jefferson Davis is a man of honor and a patriot; by the votes of men who loved Jefferson Davis, we are informed by the Senator from Alabama, by reason of the sufferings and privations and calamities that they have endured together. Sir, so long as men are found to stand on this floor and declare that Jefferson Davis was a man of honor and a patriot, and that there are millions of men in this country who love him to-day, it will be in vain to stand upon the rostrum, upon the political forum, and declare to the people of this country that the animosities engendered by the war are buried forever. It does not sound pleasantly to loyal ears, it is not an agreeable statement to men who were upon the other side of this controversy, to hear that Jefferson Davis was an honorable man and a patriot. It does not sound well to be told either that among those people whom we are called upon to recognize as brothers united by the bonds of a cemented Union there are millions of people to-day who love Jefferson Davis, and to have that continually flaunted in our faces and paraded upon this floor, and announced to the people of this country by members of this body who have taken the oath of allegiance, who have been relieved of their political disabilities, and upon every occasion repeat this story that Jefferson Davis was a man of honor and a patriot.

Sir, I have heard the Senator from Missouri upon more than one occasion allude with something of pride and something, it seemed to me, of satisfaction, to the part he had played in the political fortunes of the Southern confederacy. There is no occasion that I know of for a man who is a member of this body to continually dwell upon the fact that he was a member of the Confederate States senate. It is not a matter that concerns the argument of questions here; nor is it desirable, it appears to me, in a discussion of this kind, when no appeal was made to partisan passions, for one Senator after another to rise in his place and dwell upon the fact that he was a member of the Southern confederacy, that he was a member of the Confederate States senate, and that he believed that Jefferson Davis was beloved by the Southern people, and that he was actuated by the sentiments of a man of honor and a patriot.

I beg leave to say to the Senator from Missouri that if the memories of the war are to be forgotten, if a review of the transactions of the past is not desirable, if any reference to the passions of that epoch is to be reprobated, it is not desirable that a member of this body should repeat so often as the Senator from Missouri does that he was a member of the Confederate States senate; and inasmuch as he has on many occasions seen fit to make that statement, I beg leave to state to him that so far as the State of Missouri is concerned he never was accredited to the Confederate States senate. The State of Missouri was never out of the Union; there never was a governor that could accredit him, there never was a Legislature that could elect him; and in the name of the loyal people of that State, for whom I have a right to speak, I protest against the continual repetition here of the sentiments that I have heard the Senator from Missouri so often make.

Mr. President, I have no desire, so far as I am concerned, to take any part in any partisan discussion. I have sedulously refrained from it. I have never upon any occasion referred to these subjects during this session of Congress. Here is a simple question as to whether a certain resolution shall be adopted permitting the printing of material that has been transmitted to the War Department.

Mr. HAWLEY. Allow me to correct the Senator. So far as it has gone it does not even say it shall be printed. It asks the President, if not in his judgment incompatible with the public interest, to send it to us.

Mr. INGALLS. So that it may be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY. The printing will be a subsequent consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. This has been alluded to as an unfortunate controversy between two private citizens. It is in no sense whatever a controversy between two private citizens. It reaches the dignity of a great political question, of a great political discussion, and the Senators upon the other side of this Chamber have made it so by declaring that in a controversy between William T. Sherman and Jefferson Davis they are for Jefferson Davis. Well, sir, as between William T. Sherman and Jefferson Davis I am for William T. Sherman; and whenever this question is raised before the Senate, or before the people of the United States, the loyal men of this country, the loyal men of the North particularly, will always be in favor of William T. Sherman as against Jefferson Davis. And if the Senator from Alabama, the Senator from Mississippi, and the Senator from Missouri think that they can afford to invite a renewal of that controversy, let them do it. We are as ready to meet that issue as we ever have been.

Now, sir, the allegation, I understand, is made that General Sherman—it may be upon a private occasion, upon a festive occasion, before a Grand Army post, an occasion when soldiers get together and renew the memories of that contest in which they were engaged—made a certain statement with regard to the part that Jefferson Davis took during the controversy between the States. There was a publication of his remarks. It was replied to by Jefferson Davis, who declared in effect that William T. Sherman was a liar—I suppose that is the plain English of it; that upon this question that involved not merely the personal relations of these two gentlemen to each other or the personal relations of Jefferson Davis to the confederacy, but his official relations, Mr. Sherman had made a statement that was willfully and knowingly false. General Sherman replied; he has made a public statement that it is desirable the people of this country should possess; and the Senator from Connecticut now asks a resolution that this may be transmitted to the Senate, not for the purpose of being printed, but that it may be ascertained whether it should be printed or not; and Senator after Senator arises upon the Democratic side of this Chamber and objects to it because it will involve the honor or the patriotism of Jefferson Davis!

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I should not have said a word about this matter, being restrained by a sense of personal delicacy on account of my relation with one of the gentlemen named in the resolution, but for the fact that Senators on the other side of the House seem to regard this as a mere personal controversy between two citizens. I know it will be very much a matter of surprise to General Sherman to learn that this is a controversy between himself and Jefferson Davis. He says in the correspondence that he does not know Jefferson Davis; he did not see him when he was Secretary of War, he was then not in the Army, and he never has had any personal relations with him whatever. Therefore there was no controversy of a personal character between them. On the other hand General Sherman, a citizen of Saint Louis, attends by invitation the Frank Blair Grand Army post, composed of soldiers, their wives and families. In the course of that meeting, entirely impromptu, without any preparation, he is called upon in pursuance of their customs to make a speech, and he does so, a brief speech, the contents of which were substantially stated in the public prints in Saint Louis.

The allegations contained in that speech as published in the papers and as mentioned in the statement by General Sherman now in the War Department are that he regarded Jefferson Davis not only as a rebel but as a conspirator, and that he saw not only letters but papers captured during the war, and especially while he was marching in his well-known march through Georgia, which tended to show that Jefferson Davis while the war was progressing had abandoned his State-rights doctrines and had become practically a dictator in the South. That was in substance the statement made by General Sherman without the slightest personal reference to Jefferson Davis as a man, but only referring to him as the leader of the great army and the great cause which these soldiers had endeavored to overthrow by superior force. That was the statement. As to any personal controversy between these two persons, there was nothing of the kind evinced, except General Sherman did insist that he had the historical right to class Jefferson Davis as a conspirator and a traitor. Did that make a personal quarrel between Jefferson Davis and W. T. Sherman? Far from it. I might in the same way make a personal quarrel with all the descendants of Benedict Arnold by stating the historical fact about him.

What followed? Mr. Davis, seeing this and becoming angered by it, writes a very bitter article, not to General Sherman, but to some newspaper in which he saw the publication, in which, as the Senator from Kansas very properly remarks, he said substantially General Sherman makes a false statement—stronger language even, substantially that General Sherman lied; gives him the lie. This was not addressed to General Sherman. General Sherman, who had the honor to command the Army of the United States and had been, to say the least, a conspicuous actor in the great military events of the war, and who was still in every sense an officer of the Army subject to the orders of the President of the United States at any time, who may be court-martialed and subject to the laws of war, did not respond by a letter to Jefferson Davis, or by sending his views to a public print and thus getting into a newspaper wrangle. He did exactly the opposite of that. As an officer of the Army he gave to his military superior the reasons and evidence, which justified every observation that he had made, and deposited this in the public records, as he was bound to do.

If an officer of the Army of the United States, whether retired or not, has put upon him any insult whatever, which among gentlemen would be regarded as a matter of reproach, he is bound in honor and by his military rank to make an explanation to the proper authorities to show that the imputation upon his honor is not correct, and that he only did what he was justified in doing in speaking of a historical character. That is what General Sherman did. That is the letter that he sent, after careful preparation, to the Department. I have read that letter. There is not a word of personal unkindness to Jefferson Davis or to mortal man in it, but there are statements there and letters of a striking character, which in my judgment ought to be published, so that they may become a part not of the newspaper literature of the day, but of the public records. The first is—and I think it is the first time I ever saw it, though it may have been published before—he produces resolutions adopted by a meeting of Democratic Senators and members from the Southern States who were about to participate in the rebellion, in which they resolved that they would organize a separate government, called the confederate government, at Montgomery, Ala., and fixed the day, the same day that was subsequently adopted.

They also resolved that a committee of three persons—not of two, as the Senator from Connecticut erroneously stated—consisting of Jefferson Davis and Mr. Slidell and Mr. Mallory, should be appointed to carry into execution the resolutions adopted, and that a portion of them should remain in Congress so as by their votes to prevent Congress from taking measures to defeat or delay their operations in the South. If that is not a conspiracy, in the name of God what is? Think of it! That members of this body should conspire together when under the same oath and sanction all of us are under, should go to a private chamber and there with others resolve that they will not only break up this Government of ours but actually prevent the Government from arming itself and defending its life! That is a conspiracy. If that is not a conspiracy God knows what is.

That justified General Sherman in one of the remarks that he made. The other was that a certain letter he had seen himself from Jefferson Davis to a gentleman since a member of the Senate of the United States tended to show that Jefferson Davis had changed his opinions in 1864; that instead of being a State-rights democrat he was practically intending to subvert even the government that had been established in the Southern States.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the Senator mean a letter to a Senator of the United States or of the Confederate States?

Mr. SHERMAN. A letter from Jefferson Davis to one who, I think, has since been a Senator of the United States. General Sherman insists that he did see such a letter, states the circumstances when and where, and that this paper either came to Washington into the general collection here, where it is in the mass of unassorted documents difficult to find, or else it went to General Sherman's headquarters and thence to the headquarters of General Sheridan, where it was destroyed by the great Chicago fire, but that he did see it and remembers its contents. To show that the opinions avowed in the letter were entertained and acted upon by Jefferson Davis he produces a letter from Alexander H Stephens, then an associate with Jefferson Davis in the government of the rebel confederacy, in which Mr. Stephens says of Jefferson Davis that he has abandoned his State-rights doctrine, that he was then in his opinion seeking to subvert the very government that had been established by the Confederate States. That letter has been recently published. It has never gone into the public archives until presented on this occasion. It is a very interesting letter, which was captured in the hands of the person to whom it was addressed, a person scarcely less distinguished than Mr. Stephens—Herschel V. Johnson.

That letter was captured at the house of Johnson. I have seen the original of that letter. I know Mr. Stephens's handwriting both before the war and since. I know that it is his handwriting, and it will not be disputed by any one. In that Mr. Stephens justifies every word that was said by General Sherman in respect to the change of mind in Jefferson Davis in the condition of affairs as they existed in 1864.

That is not all. He produces a message of Jefferson Davis himself, dated in January, 1864, addressed to the confederate congress, marked "secret," and kept in the rebel archives, and found there by an officer of the United States Army when Richmond was taken by the United States troops. In this official message, which has never heretofore been published, Jefferson Davis says that the movements in the South, but especially in North Carolina, would tend to subvert the confederate government and must be resisted by every means possible, and demands the suspension of the habeas corpus. The indorsements on the back of that paper show that in the confederate congress such a bill was introduced and was reported by a committee to that congress. Whether that bill passed or not is not known unless it is shown by the confederate records; but it is probably not shown by these records, because it was a secret document. That original document is now in the hands of an officer of the Army with the name of Jefferson Davis in his own handwriting—I am not familiar with it at all, I can not recognize it, but it is said to be so, and it has all the earmarks of an official document precisely such as the documents we have here shown.

Now, Mr. President, the question is at this time, twenty years after the war is over, when these documents are first presented to the public, when they are filed in the War Department, whether it is beyond a reasonable rule for the Senate of the United States to call for their publication. Publications in the newspapers scatter and disappear. This paper is filed in the war records, but it may not be printed in the war records, it may be excluded for the technical reason stated by the Senator from Massachusetts. Why should we not print it, why should there be a single objection to it? Are these papers mere random documents or are they official testimony of the aims, objects, and tendencies of the confederate congress at the time stated? Do they not show the origin of this great civil war through which we have passed? Do they not show the probable termination of the confederate government even if the rebellion had not been borne down by the United States Army? Do they not show that in all human probability the termination of the rebellion, if successful, would have been an absolute despotism in the Southern States?

These are official documents and should be discussed without feeling. I have none and show none, I hope. All I desire is to prove that the general named in the resolution has only done what is becoming an officer and a gentleman. When his word to his fellow-soldiers was disputed he did not reply by writing to Jefferson Davis and calling him names or sending to any public print and entering into a contest with Mr. Davis. Mr. Davis is an old man. I do not desire to say anything personally unkind of him; I do not desire to wound his feelings; but, great God! will it ever be disputed in this country of ours at any time, even a thousand years hence, that Jefferson Davis in the war and before the war was a conspirator and a traitor to his country? Never, I trust. And while all these events have passed away, while we here from opposite sides are standing with each other making laws for our common people, yet, sir, we do not and I can not while I live at least see that great truth and fact in history challenged, and Jefferson Davis praised as a patriot any more than our Revolutionary fathers would have allowed in their time and their day the name of Benedict Arnold to be praised at least without entering their most solemn protest.

I am sorry this debate has sprung up. I was in hopes with the Senator from Connecticut, who introduced the resolution, that these papers would be published and nothing more would be said about them here, but let the people determine the issue and let this matter go down into history. But, sir, whenever, in my presence, in a public assemblage, Jefferson Davis shall be treated as a patriot, I must enter my solemn protest. Whenever the motives and causes of the war, the beginning and the end of which I have seen, are brought in question, I must stand, as I have always stood, upon the firm conviction that it was a causeless rebellion, made with bad motives, and that all the men who led in that movement were traitors to their country.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, I have just stepped into the Senate, and have not yet heard the resolution which is under discussion. I presume it refers to a publication of some papers relating to the war of secession that are now on file in the War Department. Without knowing the position occupied by my friends on this side or upon the part of Senators on the other side, I desire here to say that I have no objection to any publication which will throw light upon the true character of that movement for the separation of the States of the South from the States of the North, and I should not have made any remarks except to have followed and to have given my vote silently upon this question but for the speech I have listened to of the Senator from Ohio. That speech, sir, is marked by flagrant inaccuracies in his statements of the issue between General Sherman and Mr. Davis. The issue between those two distinguished gentlemen is not the issue which the Senator from Ohio represents, and the issue which does exist between them he has not brought to the attention of the Senate.

Now, sir, according to the publication in the press, and which went not only to the extremities of this nation but to the extremities of civilization, it was not merely that the secession of the Southern States was the result of a conspiracy. That is a question, as the Senator properly remarked, of historical truth, and is to be ascertained by the facts of history as read in future generations. Whether it was a conspiracy of a few ambitious individuals, or whether it was the uprising of a whole people to preserve, as they thought, their autonomy and their institutions, is a question which I am willing shall be remitted to the verdict of posterity.

But, sir, General Sherman went further; and I wish to here say that there is no man on this floor who personally has kinder feelings for General Sherman than myself. No Senator here entertains a higher admiration for his military sagacity and genius. But General Sherman was betrayed by his feelings and by misinformation into an allegation and charge against Jefferson Davis that he can not sustain and that no man can ever sustain, and which is not the truth; and that is that he saw a letter from Jefferson Davis asserting that if a Southern State should secede from the confederacy he would put that down by military coercion of the Confederate Government. That is the statement which General Sherman made. There is no question of historical fact in relation to the character of that movement between General Sherman and Mr. Davis. It is outside of the record, and when he says that there is no personal controversy between these two distinguished gentlemen his statement comes in direct conflict with the assertion of General Sherman himself, for, when he was interviewed by the press of Saint Louis as to Mr. Davis's denial he refused to make a statement, and said, "This is not for the press of the country; it is a personal matter between me and Mr. Davis." The personality of it is made by General Sherman himself.

And, sir, the discussion which is brought out here can throw no light whatever on that naked, bald issue of fact, whether or not General Sherman saw a letter written by Jefferson Davis to a Senator now in the United States Senate, saying he would coerce a Southern State if it should secede from the confederacy. I assert that no such letter is in existence, and, in my opinion, no such letter was ever written; and in saying that, sir, I wish to disclaim here any reflection whatever upon the veracity of General Sherman. That is not my purpose. What I do mean to say is that he has been misled and misinformed; and when the proof comes before him that he has made an assertion, even against a political enemy, which he can not sustain, it would comport better with his high character and high position to acknowledge the inadvertent and unintentional injustice than to change the issue before the American people and raise a question as to the character of the secession of the Southern States.

Now, sir, I have a reason for saying this: Not more intimate than other gentlemen but still a friend of Mr. Davis and often in consultation with him, if he changed his opinion, if he varied one hair's-breadth from the beginning of that controversy to its close as to the importance of maintaining that government upon the consent of the people engaged in it and not upon any force to be brought upon them, his most intimate friends were ignorant of any such revolution of sentiment. No man stood by the doctrine that it should be a government based upon consent and not upon force through all the eventful scenes of the struggle than Mr. Davis did; and General Sherman was simply mistaken, he was misinformed. No such letter was written by Mr. Davis, for no such letter could have been written, entertaining the views he did.

Sir, I have made these remarks very unexpectedly to myself, for I was not aware that the simple issue of fact, whether or not General Sherman saw such a letter, was to be remitted to the arena of the United States Senate.

One other thing. We of the South have surrendered upon all the questions which divided the two sides in that controversy. We have given up the right of the people to secede from this Union; we have given up the right of each State to judge for itself of the infractions of the Constitution and the mode of redress; we have given up the right to control our own domestic institutions. We fought for all these, and we lost in that controversy; but no man shall in my presence call Jefferson Davis a traitor without my responding with a stern and emphatic denial.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have very few words to say.

The Senator from Kansas can indulge in no debate that arises in this body without being personal. The character of debate in which the Senator from Kansas always indulges is impressed most emphatically upon the records of the Senate. The Senator is a verbal horror and an oral terror. In the old common law there was an offense called that of being a common scold, or communis rixatrix, which was punished under the old English statute with the ducking-stool. I would not, of course, prescribe any such punishment to the Senator from Kansas, but no occasion is permitted by him to pass by without reading lectures to his peers upon this floor in regard to every subject that comes up for discussion.

Mr. President, by no legitimate course of argument can the issues of the late war be brought into this question to-day. The Confederate States are dead. The soldiers that fought for the confederacy and for the Union sleep side by side, having illustrated by matchless deeds of valor the heroism of both sections. The epitaph could be put upon them to-day as was put by the old chroniclers over the chivalry of the feudal ages:

> The knights are dust,
> And their good swords are rust,
> Their souls are with the saints, we trust.

With that declaration there should be an end of any acrimonious discussion upon the issues involved in that terrible conflict. But the Senator from Kansas seeks now by his lectures to Senators on this side of the Chamber to impute disloyalty to the oath that we have taken to support the Constitution of the United States.

The Senator says that I have been in the habit of alluding to the fact in a spirit of boastfulness that I had been a member of the confederate senate. It is not true. The records of this Senate show that upon two occasions only have I ever alluded—and then from the nature of the debate—to the fact that I had occupied that position in the confederacy; once when I delivered a eulogy upon Mr. Hill, with whom I had served in the confederate senate—every Senator will recognize the appropriateness of the allusion at that time—and again to-day, when in order to assume the full share of responsibility which is sought now in certain quarters to be put upon Mr. Davis for the war and its results, I alluded, in passing, to the fact that I had occupied the position in the confederate senate that I occupy here to-day.

The Senator says I was never accredited to the Senate of the confederacy; that there was no governor, no legislature from whom I could receive my credentials. Mr. President, I received my credentials from the governor of the State of Missouri, elected by 25,000 majority at a time of profound peace. I received my election to the provisional congress of the confederacy from a legislature elected by the people of Missouri in a time of profound peace, and before there was war flagrant in the State. I know that technically no State could secede; it is not my disposition to-day to go back into that question; and but for this personal allusion I should not have done so. And let me say now to the Senator from Kansas that my credentials to the confederate senate or to the United States Senate were never disputed by my own constituency, and he knows what I refer to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLISON in the chair). It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend a moment until the regular order is laid before the Senate, being the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

DEATH OF SENATOR ANTHONY.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 12, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

CORRECTION OF JOURNAL.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a correction in the Journal. The Journal reports the Committee on Labor as having reported back a resolution referred to them. It should read a communication from the Secretary of State was referred to that committee which resulted in a report of that committee recommending the passage of a resolution to print an additional number of copies.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the Journal examined and the proper correction made.

The Journal as corrected was then approved.

CLEPHANE AND BOSWELL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, transmitting the account of Clephane and Boswell for stenographic work in the case of Kilbourn against Thompson, $139.75.

Mr. RANDALL. The subject connected with the Thompson case has gone to the Judiciary Committee. This I think should take the same course. It is a mere claim against the Government, and perhaps should go to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, too. But a part of the subject has gone to the Committee on the Judiciary, which relates to the compensation of the late Sergeant-at-Arms of the House. There was also a communication a week or two ago from the Attorney-General of the United States in relation to the compensation of stenographers, which went to the Committee on Appropriations. Now if the Committee on Appropriations can be discharged from the further consideration of that subject both of them might go together to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RANDALL. I think at any rate the papers relate to a claim rather than to an appropriation in obedience to law. I will ask the Speaker to examine and see if I am not right in this impression.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, on an examination of the papers, that this is simply a claim for compensation. If there be no objection, the Committee on Appropriations will be discharged from the further consideration of the former communication upon the same subject and both referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RANDALL. One committee had better have entire charge of that branch of the subject.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

OSAGE INDIANS OF KANSAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, with inclosures relative to the claim of Captain & Co. for supplies furnished the Osage Indians in Kansas in 1871–'72—$1,416.10; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF NEW YORK HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Chief of Engineers inclosing a map of survey and report upon the work of deepening Gedney's Channel through Sandy Hook Bar, N. Y.; and also inclosing a report from the board of fortifications upon the plan for the permanent improvement of the entrance of New York Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (S. 491) for the relief of J. H. Franklin, executor of the last will of John Armfield, deceased.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. PERKINS, of Kansas, in place of Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio, resigned, as a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

O. W. STREETER.

Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 1821, for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to examine and adjust the claim of O. W. Streeter for moneys expended and services performed by him in the year 1860 as special agent of the United States to take the census of the country west of Minnesota, then known as Dakota, allowing to the said O. W. Streeter, in addition to the amount heretofore received by him, reimbursement for reasonable and necessary expenditures shown to have been made by him and reasonable compensation for his time and services, settling the same on principles of justice and equity; and that he be, and is hereby, further authorized and directed to draw his requisition in favor of said claimant, O. W. Streeter, for the amount which he may find justly due said claimant, on the Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized and directed to pay the same out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the amount allowed and to be paid hereunder shall in no event exceed the sum of $10,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe there has been a report from the Committee on Claims of this House on this subject.

Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota. There is a unanimous report from the Committee on Claims of the House, and also a report accompanying the Senate bill. The bills, I will state, are identical, word for word.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. WHEELER.

Mr. HALSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 5322) on the Private Calendar be taken up for present consideration. It is a bill for the benefit of William H. Wheeler.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to William H. Wheeler, of Warren County, Kentucky, the sum of $1,278, for quartermaster stores furnished the United States Army in the year 1862, and used by said Army.

The committee recommend the striking out of the words "one thousand two hundred and seventy-eight dollars," and the insertion of "six hundred and thirty-three dollars and fifty cents."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Has this subject been considered by the Committee on War Claims?

Mr. HALSELL. Yes, sir. Here is the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the report will be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. KEIFER. Let the report be read subject to the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The right to object is reserved.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

Mr. FERRELL, from the Committee on War Claims, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 5322.

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5322) for the relief of William H. Wheeler, submit the following report:

This claim is for corn and fodder taken by the Union Army from the claimant, at or near Bowling Green, Ky., in the year 1862.

The claim was duly presented to the Quartermaster-General for settlement, and was referred by the Quartermaster-General to an agent for investigation and report. On November 22, 1881, the agent submitted a report, recommending that claimant be paid the sum of $633.50. General James A. Ekin, deputy quartermaster-general, United States Army, indorsed the agent's report as follows:

"The proof supplied appears to be of a reliable nature, and the claim, to a certain extent is, no doubt, meritorious. The estimate made by the investigating agent of corn and fodder taken in this instance, as a result of his investigation, is considered reasonable and just—placing its valuation at $633.50 unpaid for—and which sum he recommends be allowed claimant in full of claim. I concur in the agent's recommendation. Claimant was loyal."

The case was considered September 9, 1882, and no allowance recommended by the Quartermaster-General.

The loyalty of the claimant and the taking of the property and its value are proven to the satisfaction of the committee; and they report back the bill with the recommendation that it do pass with an amendment, as follows:

Insert in lines 6 and 7, in place of "one thousand two hundred and seventy-eight dollars," the words "six hundred and thirty-three dollars and fifty cents."

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask a single question. This claim was subject to adjustment through the Quartermaster's Department. It would have gone to the Third Auditor in regular course under the law of 1864 and then would have been reported to the House. Will the gentleman from Kentucky state the reason why this was not done? Was this claim allowed by the Quartermaster-General?

Mr. HALSELL. Yes, sir; there was a mistake. The claim went to the Quartermaster's Department. It seems they had informed Mr. Wheeler that they were not satisfied as to his loyalty, and proof was taken as to that. When I investigated the papers I found it had been settled on a different question. The claimant had thus been thrown off his guard on the merits of the case. He took the necessary proof afterward. The Quartermaster-General sent out his agent and that agent makes the report in favor of the claim.

Mr. HOLMAN. This report was made after the time for allowing the claim?

Mr. HALSELL. Yes, sir; the proof was taken upon the claim after it was found the man had been thrown off his guard by reason of the fact that his attention was called all the time to the question of loyalty.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is a large body of those claims and a great many of them have been disallowed. I do not, however, interpose an objection.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Quartermaster-General says there was a mistake which prevented the proper proof being taken at the time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALSELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANK OF BLOOMINGTON.

Mr. ROWELL. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7768) to authorize the National Bank of Bloomington, Ill., to change its name to the First National Bank of Bloomington, Ill., and that it be put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of the National Bank of Bloomington, Ill., shall be changed to the First National Bank of Bloomington, Ill., whenever the board of directors of said bank shall accept the new name by resolutions of the board, and cause a copy of such resolutions, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency: Provided, That such acceptance be made within six months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That all debts, demands, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the National Bank of Bloomington, Ill., shall devolve upon and inure to the First National Bank of Bloomington, Ill., whenever such change of name is effected.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency with the following amendments:

After the word "Bloomington," in the third line, insert the words "located at Bloomington."

In line 5, strike out "Illinois."

In line 3, section 2, strike out "Illinois."

In line 4, section 2, strike out "Illinois."

Mr. WELLER. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The gentleman is just back; he is just in time to save the nation.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. WELLER said: I withdraw my objection on the ground that the bill only makes a change as to the name and does not affect the bank otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROWELL. The title should be amended by striking out the word "Illinois."

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

URIEL CROCKER.

Mr. MORSE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 862) for the relief of Uriel Crocker.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper officer of the United States Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Uriel Crocker, of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, or to his proper attorney or legal representatives, the sum of $386, being the amount due upon four coupon bonds of the United States of the denomination of $50 each, and upon the coupons belonging thereto, which were payable from July 1, 1866, to July 1, 1881, both inclusive, which said bonds were of the loan of July 17, 1861, payable after June 30, 1881, were numbered 2519, 2520, 2521, 2522, and have been lost and are believed to have been destroyed: Provided, That he or they shall first file with the proper officer of the Treasury Department a satisfactory bond of indemnity in double the amount so authorized to be paid as aforesaid.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the report will be read.

Mr. MORSE. I send to the desk the Senate report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report made in the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has not the bill been considered by the House committee?

Mr. MORSE. The House committee had the bill under consideration several times. The only objection they had to it was that they would prefer at some time or other to have a general bill passed to meet all such cases. But the members of the committee individually gave me to understand that they had no objection to my offering this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman alludes to the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. MORSE. Yes, sir.

The Senate report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 862) for the relief of Uriel Crocker, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

On the 5th of July, 1866, Uriel Crocker gave notice to the Treasury Department of the loss of the bonds described in the bill, and notified the Treasurer not to pay the coupons. Similar notifications were sent to the Treasurer from this date until the year 1880.

Mr. Crocker is unable to account for the loss of the bonds, save only that they were put in a box, which was locked and kept in a bank vault, he having the key to the box, and, on the date indicated, after an examination of the box, he was unable to find them. He believes that they were at some time dropped, and with waste papers swept up and burned.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, of date of February 7, 1884, states that these bonds appear as outstanding on the books of the Department, and that none of the coupons have been presented for payment since July, 1866. From this it would appear that the bonds have not been found since July 5, 1866, or during a period of eighteen years, so that it is probable that they are not now in existence. Existing law does not authorize the Treasurer to pay these bonds, for the reason that there is no evidence that they have been actually destroyed.

The committee is of opinion that the lapse of eighteen years is a sufficient time to create strong presumption that the bonds have been destroyed, especially as the bonds matured in 1881, and had been previously called and no sign or trace of them appears in any way, and during all this time no coupons have been presented.

Mr. Crocker, the claimant, is a man of undoubted respectability both as to character and means, and has persistently made his claim at the Treasury Department for many years.

The bill requires a bond of indemnity to be filed with the Treasurer in double the amount authorized to be paid, which in any event would protect the Government in case the bonds should be hereafter found, which is not probable.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3593) for the erection of a public building at Chicago, Ill., and to bring it before the House for present action.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to cause the erection of a substantial and commodious building, upon ground owned by the United States on the corner of Fifth avenue and Polk street, and known as the "Old Bridewell and dock property," in the city of Chicago, Ill., for the use of the United States local appraiser and other Government uses; the building, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the cost of $50,000.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended in the erection of said building.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it be stated that that amount of money shall complete the building.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That is precisely what the bill does.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not understand that it quite says so.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That is all that is required, and the bill says so.

Mr. RANDALL. Let that part of the bill be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

The building, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the cost of $50,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the bill makes an appropriation of money, does it not?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish it to be noticed that the passage of this bill is recommended by the Treasury Department.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Yes, sir; it is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES M. BLAKE.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 1758) for the relief of Charles M. Blake, a chaplain in the United States Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed in the settlement of the accounts of Charles M. Blake, a post-chaplain in the United States Army, to allow him credit for all pay and allowances paid to or received by him as a post-chaplain in the United States Army from May 14, 1878, to May 20, 1881; Provided, That no pay shall be allowed or credit given for service for any purpose for the period from July 2, 1870, to May 14, 1878; and that said Blake shall accept the terms of this act in full satisfaction and discharge of any and all claims of every kind on his part against the United States growing out of his connection or alleged connection as chaplain or post-chaplain.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. ROSECRANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGES ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 2061) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Mississippi River, one within the State of Minnesota and one between the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to object to this measure, but there has been for a long time an understanding that the Committee on Commerce would report a general measure embracing all this class of legislation.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman will not object to this bill. The Committee on Commerce have thus far reported no general bill on this subject, and we have no assurance that they will report any bill of the character indicated by the gentleman. I submit to him that it will not do to have the business of the country suspended waiting for the possible or probable action of that committee.

This bill provides for the erection of bridges on a line of road running up the Wisconsin and Illinois side of the Mississippi River, and is of great interest to the commerce and transportation of Iowa and Minnesota. For these reasons I sincerely trust the gentleman from Indiana will make no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not interpose objection at this time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Chicago, Saint Paul and Saint Louis Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a railroad bridge across the Mississippi River at the most suitable point between the cities of Hastings and Red Wing: Provided, That Congress may at any time prescribe such rules and regulations in regard to toll and otherwise as may be deemed reasonable.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act may, at the option of the company building the same, be built as a pivot drawbridge or with unbroken or continuous spans: Provided, That if made with continuous or unbroken spans, it shall not be of less elevation in any case than fifty-five and one-half feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the bottom chord of the bridge, nor shall the spans give a clear width of water way of less than two hundred and fifty feet; and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river, and give a clear width of water way of not less than three hundred feet: And provided also, That any bridge built under this act as a pivot drawbridge shall have a draw over the main channel at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans giving a clear width of water way of not less than one hundred and sixty feet on each side of the central pivot pier of the draw, and the next adjoining span or spans shall give a clear width of water way of not less than two hundred and fifty feet, and said spans shall not be less than thirty feet above low-water mark and not less than ten feet above extreme high-water mark, measured to the bottom chord of the bridge: Provided, That said draw shall always be opened promptly upon reasonable signal; and said company, or its successors and assigns, shall at all proper times keep and maintain such lights as the Light-House Board may direct; and all plans for the construction of said bridge and approaches thereto must first be submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval, and when the same shall be approved by the said Secretary the work thereon may be commenced and prosecuted to completion: And provided further, That as nearly as practicable the said bridge shall be at right angles to and the piers parallel with the current of said river: And provided further, That any change in the mode of construction of said bridge shall be first submitted to the said Secretary for his approval, and when approved the said company may then proceed with the construction in accordance with said change: And provided further, That if said bridge when constructed shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, be a substantial obstruction to the navigation of said river, the said Secretary shall require said company to change the construction thereof so as to avoid any serious and substantial obstruction to the navigation of said river, at the expense of the owners of said bridge.

SEC. 3. That the bridge hereby authorized shall be a lawful structure, and shall be a post-route, upon which no higher charge shall be made for the transportation of the mails of the United States, and the troops and munitions of war, or for passengers or freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile paid to railroads and transportation companies leading to said bridge.

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains or cars over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any one of them, desiring such use shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War, upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties: Provided, That the provisions of section 3 in regard to charges for passengers and freight across said bridge shall not govern the Secretary of War in determining any question arising as to the sum or sums to be paid to the owners of said bridge by said companies for the use of said bridge.

SEC. 5. That this act shall be subject, except as above mentioned, to the limitations and provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the town of Clinton, in the State of Iowa, and other bridges across said river, and to establish them as post-roads," approved April 1, 1872.

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, on satisfactory proof that a necessity exists therefor, to require the company or persons owning said bridge to cause such aids to the passage of said bridge to be constructed, placed, and maintained, at their own cost and expense, in the form of booms, dikes, piers, or other suitable and proper structures for confining the flow of water to a permanent channel and for the guiding of rafts, steamboats, and other water craft safely through the draw and raft spans, as shall be specified in his order in that behalf.

SEC. 7. That the United States shall have the right of way for postal telegraph across said bridge.

SEC. 8. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; and the right to require any changes in such structure, or its entire removal, at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interest requires it, is also expressly reserved.

SEC. 9. That said company, its successors and assigns, may construct and maintain a bridge across the Mississippi River at a suitable point between the western limits of Hastings, Minn., and the western limits of Saint Paul, Minn.: Provided, That the bridge authorized by this section shall have all the privileges and be subject to all the terms, restrictions, reservations of power, and requirements contained in the foregoing sections of this act.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Be it enacted, &c., That the term "heirs," or other words of like import, shall not be requisite, in any deed or will hereafter made of land in the District of Columbia, to convey or create an estate in fee-simple, but every grant or devise of land in said District hereafter made shall vest in the grantee or devisee all the interest and estate, legal and equitable, of the grantor or devisor in the premises granted or devised, unless an intent to pass a less estate or interest is expressed or necessarily implied.

SEC. 2. That a general devise in any will hereafter made, and remaining in force at the date of the decease of the testator, shall be deemed and held to pass all the interest and estate, legal and equitable, which the testator had therein at the time of his death, whether acquired before or after the making of the will, unless a contrary intent is expressed or necessarily implied.

SEC. 3. That where two or more persons are named as grantees or devisees in any deed or will hereafter made, except when named or taking as trustees, such persons shall be deemed and held to take as tenants in common and not as joint tenants, unless a contrary intent is expressed.

SEC. 4. That any instrument of writing hereafter signed, acknowledged, and recorded in said District, and in the following form or to the like effect, namely: "This deed, made this —— day of ——, A. D. —, between —— —— [the grantor] and —— —— [the grantee], witnesseth: That in consideration of —— [here state the consideration] the said —— —— [the grantor] conveys unto the said —— —— [the grantee] the following property situate in the District of Columbia: —— [here describe the property]. SEC. 6. That if in any such instrument as aforesaid the words "and warrants" (or "warrant") "specially" shall be used after the word "conveys" or "convey," the grantor or grantors shall be deemed and held to covenant, for himself, herself, or themselves, his, her, or their heirs and legal representatives, with the grantee or grantees, his, her, or their heirs and assigns, to forever warrant and defend the title to the granted premises, unto the grantee or grantees, his, her, or their heirs and assigns, from and against all persons claiming by, through, or under the grantor or grantors, his, her, or their heirs and assigns.

SEC. 7. That any person claiming title to land in the District of Columbia by descent, or having acquired title from or through any person or persons who claimed the same by descent, may file a petition on the equity side of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, verified by the oath of the petitioner, setting forth the name of the intestate, the date and place of his or her decease, as nearly as can be ascertained, a full description of the land and premises of which the intestate died seized, in law or in equity, and the manner in which the intestate acquired title to the same, the name or names of the person or persons claiming or who claimed to be the sole or only heir or heirs of the intestate, and the relationship of such person or persons to the intestate, and praying the court to decree that the person or persons so named is or are the sole or only heir or heirs of the intestate; and thereupon an order may issue, as of course, setting forth the substance of the petition, and warning all persons interested to appear by a day therein to be named, not less than thirty days from the date of the filing of such petition, and show cause against the granting of the prayer thereof, a duly certified copy of which order shall be published daily, Sundays excepted, for twenty days, in some newspaper of general circulation printed and published in said District; and if the intestate was at the date of decease domiciled outside of said District, like publication shall be made in such issue of some newspaper printed or published at the city, town, or county where he or she was so domiciled, for the period of at least twenty days.

That on proof to the satisfaction of the court of publication being made as aforesaid, the court may direct evidence to be taken, by commission or otherwise, in support of the allegations of the petition, and in case of conflicting claims of heirship may direct an issue to be framed, and refer the same to the law side of the court for trial by jury; and on hearing and considering the proceedings the court may pass a decree declaring who were or are the only heirs at law of the intestate; and when a copy of such decree, certified by the clerk under his hand and the seal of the court, is recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds of said District, the record thereof shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of law and equity of the fact therein stated. The court shall have power to adopt such rules as in its judgment may seem requisite in the premises.

That no conveyance of land, or any interest in land, whereof the grantor, at the date of such conveyance, shall not be in possession, actual or constructive, except when made by a person claiming under the person in possession, or those under whom he claims, or by a reversioner or remainderman, or by a trustee or officer executing a writ, order, or decree against the person in possession, or those under whom he claims, or by a public officer or officers in the discharge of official duty, or between persons claiming as co-tenants, shall invest the grantee or grantees, his, her, or their heirs or assigns, with any right to have or maintain any suit or action at law or in equity, in respect of or concerning the land or interest granted, against any person or persons in the peaceable possession, actual or constructive, of such land or interest, claiming adversely to the grantor or grantors in any such conveyance.

SEC. 11. That when possession has been acquired, and has existed as set forth in the ninth section of this act, and the person in possession, actual or constructive, desires to perpetuate record proof thereof, such person may file a petition on the equity side of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, verified by the oath of the petitioner, setting forth the fact of such possession, a full description of the property, and the manner in which the petitioner, or those under whom the petitioner claims, acquired title; and thereupon an order may issue, as of course, reciting in brief the substance of the petition, and warning all persons interested to appear by a day therein named, which shall be not less than thirty days after the filing of the petition, and show cause against the granting of the relief prayed, a copy of which order shall be published daily, Sundays and legal holidays excepted, for at least twenty days in some newspaper printed and published in said District and of general circulation therein. On proof to the satisfaction of the court of such publication being made, evidence may be taken in such manner and upon such terms as the court may prescribe; and on hearing the petition and proofs the court may, by decree, declare that the petitioner is vested with a fee-simple title to the land in question against every claimant; and when a duly certified copy of such decree is recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds of said District, the record thereof shall be prima facie evidence of the contents thereof, subject, nevertheless, to the exceptions in favor of persons laboring under disabilities mentioned in the ninth section of this act.

SEC. 18. That the recitals in any trustee's deed, executor's deed, guardian's deed, or marshal's deed heretofore or hereafter recorded in the proper office in said District shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of law or equity of the facts recited.

SEC. 19. That the provisions of sections 450 and 451 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia shall not be taken or held to apply to the acknowledgment of any conveyance heretofore made by a married woman of any estate or property referred to or contemplated by the provisions of sections 727 and 728 of said Revised Statutes, but every such acknowledgment shall be deemed and held sufficient, in law and in equity, if made agreeably to the provisions of section 442 of said Revised Statutes; and hereafter the examination of any married woman privily and apart from her husband shall not be deemed requisite to the validity of her execution or acknowledgment of any deed, deed of trust, or other instrument conveying or relinquishing her right or interest, vested, contingent, or inchoate, in any lands and tenements, whether executed and acknowledged by such married woman separately or conjointly with her husband; but every deed, deed of trust, mortgage, or other instrument of writing hereafter made by any person or persons, whether married or unmarried, shall be deemed entitled to be recorded, and the record thereof shall be deemed valid, if the same shall have annexed thereto a certificate of the proper acknowledging officer, his name and official title being thereunto subscribed, in the following form or to the like effect, namely:

"District of Columbia, ——, to wit:

"I, ——, a —— in and for said ——, hereby certify that —— ——, well known to me [or satisfactorily proven to me] to be the person who executed the aforegoing and annexed deed [or other instrument], personally appeared before me, in said ——, and acknowledged the same to be — act and deed."

Subject, nevertheless, to the requirements of sections 443 and 445 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, when such acknowledgments are taken in the places therein mentioned.

SEC. 20. That equitable interests in lands, tenements, and hereditaments in said District existing of record at the date of this act, or hereafter acquired of record, shall be subject to seizure and sale on execution on any final judgment or decree for the payment of money hereafter rendered in the supreme court of said District, or on any judgment of a justice of the peace hereafter filed and docketed in the clerk's office of said court as required by law, and shall also be subject to attachment by mesne process; but as to purchasers for value and mortgagees of the judgment debtor, the title to lands and tenements in said District, or any interest therein, shall not be affected by the lien of any such final judgment or decree after the expiration of five years from the time when such lien shall have attached; and any judgment or decree hereafter rendered or docketed as aforesaid shall be deemed and taken to be fully satisfied after the expiration of ten years from the date of rendition or docketing thereof, unless the same shall be revived by scire facias before the expiration of that period, in which event it shall continue in force for ten years longer, subject to the preceding provision respecting the lien thereof as to purchasers and mortgagees. Execution may issue on any such judgment or decree at any time within the period of ten years from the rendition, or docketing, or revival thereof, without a scire facias. No execution shall lie against lands and tenements, or any interest therein, upon a judgment of a justice of the peace, nor shall any lien be thereby created, until such judgment shall have been filed and docketed in the clerk's office, as required by the provisions of section 1022 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia. Nothing in this section shall be construed as depriving any judgment creditor of the right to enforce his lien upon an equitable interest in land by bill in equity without first making out a fieri facias.

SEC. 21. That the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall keep an attachment docket, in which, as well as in the regular docket, all attachments against real estate hereafter issued, whether in cases heretofore or hereafter commenced, shall be entered; and said clerk shall also enter in such attachment docket, in brief, the description of the property seized under any such attachment. The lien of any such attachment shall take effect, as to purchasers and creditors, without actual notice, only from the time of the entry in the attachment docket of the marshal's return. All attachments so entered shall be indexed in the name of the defendant; and for keeping said docket the clerk shall be entitled to the same fees as are now allowed by law for keeping the record of mechanics' liens.

SEC. 22. That hereafter all tax deeds executed by the officer designated by law to execute the same, of land hereafter sold for taxes, shall vest in the grantee all the right and estate of the former owner in and to the land conveyed, and shall be presumptive evidence in all courts of the District of Columbia in all controversies and suits in relation to the rights of such grantee, his heirs and assigns, of the following facts:

First. That the property so conveyed was subject to taxation for the year or years stated in the deed.

Second. That the taxes were not paid before the sale, nor the property redeemed before the said deed was executed.

Third. That the property had been duly listed and assessed; that the taxes were levied according to law, and that the property was duly advertised for sale and sold for taxes as stated in the deed.

And shall be conclusive evidence of the following:

First. That the manner in which the listing, assessment, levy, notice, and sale were conducted were in all respects as the law directed, and that the grantee was the purchaser.

Second. That all the prerequisites of the law were complied with by all the officers who had or whose duty it was to have had any part or action relating to or affecting said property, or the title so conveyed, necessary and proper to make a good and valid sale and to vest the title in the purchaser, except in regard to the foregoing points, of which said deed is declared to be presumptive evidence only.

SEC. 23. That the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall have general jurisdiction, in equity, of the interest of infants and lunatics in real estate in said District; and on petition of the guardian of any infant or committee of any lunatic having an estate or interest in any lands or tenements in said District, may decree the sale or mortgage of the whole or any part thereof, or may authorize or confirm such contracts in respect of the same as, in its discretion, having regard to the interest and advantage of such infant or lunatic, it may deem proper. The proceedings on such petition shall conform as nearly as may be to the provisions of sections 958 to 960, both inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, except that it shall not be necessary to make parties defendant those who would be heirs to the estate if the infant or lunatic were dead.

SEC. 24. That section 3 of the act of Congress approved August 15, 1876, chapter 297, entitled "An act relating to partition of real estate in the District of Columbia," be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and all sales of lands and tenements hereafter made under any decree or order in chancery shall be upon terms prescribed by the court; and the court may, by general rule, prescribe the manner and mode in which chancery sales may be made by a trustee or trustees appointed for that purpose, and the terms upon which such sales shall be made, and, unless otherwise in the decree prescribed, all sales under decree shall be in accordance with such general rule; and to that end a decree of sale may be in the following form, or to the like effect, namely:

"On consideration, it is by the court, this —— of ——, A. D. ——, ordered and decreed, that sale be made of the following real estate mentioned in the proceedings, namely: —— [description of the property to be sold]; and that —— —— [the trustee] be, and he is hereby, appointed trustee to execute this decree, in accordance with the rule of the court in such case made and provided."

No title to lands and tenements sold under any decree or order of court shall vest in the purchaser until the whole of the purchase-money is paid, or secured to the satisfaction of the court, and a conveyance ordered.

SEC. 25. That the term "land," wherever used in this act, shall be held to embrace tracts, lots, original lots, subdivision lots, or parts of lots; and the term "person," wherever used in this act, shall be held to embrace bodies corporate as well as natural persons, the plural as well as singular number and feminine as well as masculine gender.

SEC. 26. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with any of the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. BARBOUR. I ask that the report accompanying this bill be read.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. MULDROW) as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred H. R. 4958, report the accompanying substitute and recommend its passage.

The object of this bill, "to amend the laws relating to land titles in the District of Columbia" (bill H. R. 4958), is intended to simplify the present laws of the District in that respect and bring them more in harmony with modern legislation on that subject in the States.

The laws of the District on the subject of land titles are to be found partly in the common law and partly in old Maryland statutes, and require forms that are cumbersome, and include some rules unusual, not retained in modern legislation, and there seems to be a general opinion that both to make the law more simple and clear the provisions such as are embodied in this bill should be enacted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAMMOND in the chair). The question is on ordering this bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. STORM. This bill proposes to change in some very important particulars the land laws of the District of Columbia. I desire to know whether it contains any suitable provision that existing vested titles shall not be disturbed, and whether the bill as drawn applies to deeds and wills which may have been executed before the passage of the bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. I understand that this bill came from the Bar Association of this District. It was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and received the unanimous recommendation of the legal gentlemen on that committee, constituting what we call the "Subcommittee on the Judiciary."

I am not lawyer enough to answer the gentleman's questions. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] who reported the bill is absent; but other gentlemen of the committee who are lawyers will make any explanations that may be necessary. I yield so much of my time as may be desired to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. JEFFORDS], who will no doubt answer the gentleman's questions satisfactorily.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. This is a very important bill; and it seems to me best that we take it up and go through with it by sections in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BARBOUR. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The bill makes important changes in regard to the law of land titles and modifies the rules of evidence.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] who reported this bill, and who, if present, would take charge of it, is unavoidably absent. It is a long bill, and the suggestion that it be considered by sections would be reasonable enough if that course were really necessary. But I apprehend that such treatment of the bill would consume the remainder of this day, and I think gentlemen who will look at the bill will find there is no real need of considering it by sections. For instance, the first and second sections propose simply to adopt in this District what is the law perhaps in almost every State of the Union—that the word "heirs" shall not be required hereafter in any deed or will in order to pass a fee-simple title.

Mr. STORM. The question is not so much as to the law in the various States of the Union as in regard to the present law in this District which the bill proposes to change.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I can answer my friend on that subject satisfactorily, I think. The laws of this District on the general question involved in this bill are the common law of England as it stood at the time of the Revolution, with the addition of Maryland statutes up to 1801. Just there the law of Maryland is lopped off; and the stump has scarcely had any growth since.

The first and second sections of the bill provide that the word "heirs" shall not be required in a will or deed in order to pass a fee-simple title. By the third section the old common-law doctrine of joint tenancy with the right of survivorship is abolished; and it is provided in accordance with the law of Maryland, and perhaps most of the States of the Union, that where property is conveyed to two or more persons they shall take as tenants in common, unless joint tenancy be expressly provided for.

And so on with the fourth section. There is a short form of a deed in modern shape and not in the old form. Sections 5 and 6 only provide that there shall be, as is usual in most of the States, short forms of general and special warranty.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope if to that extent and to illustrate the general object of the bill my friend on the other side of the House should find no section which he thinks ought to be considered separately, then after looking over the whole bill, which has been on the Calendar and printed since June last, together with the accompanying report, it would hardly be necessary in my judgment that the House should go over the bill section by section.

Mr. PERKINS. Let the general debate be closed in five minutes.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] as insisting upon his suggestion or his desire of having the bill debated section by section?

Mr. STORM. That was not my suggestion. I only rose for the purpose of asking for some explanation. I infer from what the gentleman has said, and from reading the bill and the report, that the existing law of this District is the old common law and that the use of the word "heir" is necessary to convey title in fee-simple.

Now, the question which I wish to ask the gentleman from Maryland further is whether there is a saving clause in the bill so as to not disturb existing titles in this District, or whether it would be retroactive, so as to apply to deeds and wills executed before its passage.

I am favorable, Mr. Speaker, to the purpose of the bill. I know that the tendency of modern legislation is to simplify these matters. The question for us carefully to consider is what is the law we change in this District, and whether in making the change we interfere with vested rights and titles.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania in what he has said, but in the opinion of the committee reporting this bill it does not interfere with vested rights or titles in this District. I therefore ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the bill be considered as a whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not required. The bill having been read, it will require unanimous consent to have it read by sections.

Mr. BARBOUR. As it is suggested by several gentlemen that the bill should be temporarily passed over so that members may look into its provisions, and especially as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] who is the author of the bill is not present in the House to-day, I am willing, as chairman of the committee, to move that the bill be informally passed over not to lose its right upon the Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

PROTECTION OF CHILDREN.

Mr. BARBOUR. I now move to take from the House Calendar the bill (S. 729) for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the Association for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals for the District of Columbia shall be known as the "Washington Humane Society," and shall be authorized to extend its operations under this act to the protection of children as well as animals from cruelty and abuse. In pursuance thereof the said society may cause its proper officers or agents to prefer complaints, before any court in the District of of Columbia having jurisdiction, for the violation of any law relating to or affecting the protection of children in said District, and by its proper attorney may aid in bringing the facts before such court in any proceeding taken.

SEC. 2. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall, by the police force of said District, aid the said society, its officers and agents, in the enforcement of all laws relating to or affecting the protection of children; and the commissioners of the said District, and their successors, are authorized, in their discretion, to detail, from time to time, an officer or officers to aid specially in the work of said society, or they may commission any duly appointed agents of said society special police officers, without compensation; and such agents or officers shall have power to arrest, without warrant, all persons violating in their presence any law relating to or affecting the protection of children, or other parties so offending by virtue of a warrant issued by the police court of the District of Columbia, which offenders shall be taken by such agents or officers before the said police court of the District of Columbia for trial. Said agents or officers are also hereby empowered to bring before the said court any child who is subjected to cruel treatment, willful abuse, or neglect, or any child under 16 years of age found in a house of ill-fame; and said court may commit such child to an orphan asylum or other public charitable institution in the District of Columbia, with the consent of the constituted authorities of such asylum or institution, or make such other disposition thereof as now is or may hereafter be provided by law in cases of vagrant, destitute, or abandoned children: Provided, That any parent, guardian, or near relative who may feel aggrieved by any order of said court in the premises may appeal therefrom to the criminal court of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That any person in the District of Columbia who shall torture, cruelly beat, abuse, or otherwise willfully maltreat any child under the age of 18 years; or any person, having the custody and possession of a child under the age of 14 years, who shall expose, or aid and abet in exposing, such child in any highway, street, field, house, outhouse, or other place, with intent to abandon it; or any person, having in his custody or control a child under the age of 14 years, who shall in any way dispose of it with a view to its being employed as an acrobat, or a gymnast, or a contortionist, or a circus-rider, or a rope-walker, or in any exhibition of like dangerous character, or as a beggar, or mendicant, or pauper, or street-singer, or street-musician; or any person who shall take, receive, hire, employ, use, exhibit, or have in custody any child of the age last named for any of the purposes last enumerated, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, when convicted thereof, shall be subject to punishment by a fine of not more than $250, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or both.

SEC. 4. That any person who shall entice, decoy, place, take, or receive any female child under the age of 16 years into any house of ill-fame or disorderly house, for the purpose of prostitution, or any person who, having in his custody or control such child, shall dispose of it to be so received, or to be received in or for any obscene, indecent, or immoral purpose, exhibition, or practice, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, when convicted thereof, shall be subject to punishment by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, or both.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

In section 2, line 11, strike out the words "within their view," and insert "in their presence;" and in section 4 strike out "twenty-one" and insert "sixteen."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope we shall have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. The bill, I think, explains itself. It is not intended to interfere with personal liberty, but on the contrary to secure it. It is not in derogation of the rights of parents or guardians, but recognizes those rights to be possessed not for the benefit of the parents or guardians, but for the protection of their children and to supply their wants.

The bill is designed to embody in the statutes of the District of Columbia legislation which is found to be necessary and which has been adopted in many of the States of the Union. This bill has been prepared after careful examination of the statutory laws of the several States and especially of those of the State of New York.

The bill came from the Senate and has been reported back from the Committee on the District of Columbia with two amendments, one of them unimportant, merely correcting the verbiage in order to prevent what the committee thought might lead to ambiguity of interpretation of the law, and the other, in the fourth section, diminishing the age from 21 to 16 years. The committee supposed if the law was left at 21 it might afford opportunity for blackmail, and that there was danger that the object of the bill might be foiled or the bill rendered less successful.

I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE FOR THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BARBOUR. I move next to take from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 5249) to provide a criminal code for the District of Columbia; which was reported back from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to appoint one person learned in the law to prepare a code of criminal law for the said District of Columbia, to be submitted to Congress at its next session for approval.

SEC. 2. That the sum of —— thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay for the same.

SEC. 3. That said commissioner or codifier so appointed is hereby authorized to cause his work to be printed, and the Public Printer is hereby directed to do such printing; and said code shall be reported to Congress as soon as practicable.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In section 1, line 5, after the word "law," insert the words "who shall receive a compensation not to exceed $3,000;" and in section 2, line 1, before the word "thousand," insert the word "three;" and also by adding the following as a new section:

SEC. 4. That 50 per cent. of the amount hereby appropriated shall be paid by the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARBOUR. This bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], and I will yield the floor to him.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. MCCOMAS) was read, as follows:

The condition of the statute law of the District of Columbia is deplorable. Congress has never found time to give to the subject the attention absolutely necessary. Repeated attempts to provide a code have resulted in repeated failures. The chance of success grows less as the volume of Congressional legislation increases. To attempt at this time to pass a code would surely fail. But something may yet be done which will meet present needs and serve as a basis for a code in the future. The condition of the criminal laws in force here is a public scandal. The laws of England prior to July 4, 1776, and the laws of Maryland as they existed February 27, 1801, constitute the body of the laws for the punishment of crime in this District. Congress at times has spasmodically patched the system. Substantially there has been no development or improvement upon the laws of Maryland in force in 1801. During eighty-three years some penalties and even crimes have become obsolete. New crimes have been frequent that are difficult to punish under existing statutes. Confusion and delay result which an able and upright bench can not prevent.

We are told that unusual difficulties arise in classifying offenses as misdemeanors or felonies, uncertainties as to the results of conviction respecting disabilities and forfeitures, the right of defendants and the Government to challenge the qualification of jurors, the selection of talesmen, the process for witnesses beyond the jurisdiction and their compensation. The laws respecting lotteries and gambling are very loose. There are no degrees in murder. A jury is compelled to find murder or manslaughter, and a criminal thus escapes with inadequate punishment. There is no penalty for incest. Adultery escapes with the slight penalty of four hundred pounds of tobacco, while for blasphemy the law prescribes boring through the tongue with a red-hot iron.

Arson in the daytime and arson at night are not differently punished. It was long doubted whether the appalling crime of Guiteau could be tried and punished in this District.

Enough instances have been cited to show the need of a criminal code, which is one step in the right direction. Others will follow. This reform should not be delayed.

This bill (No. 5249), as amended by the committee, provides that—

(1) The judges of the supreme court of the District shall appoint one competent lawyer as a commissioner to prepare a criminal code to [be submitted to] Congress for its approval. It does not limit the time to the duration of the present Congress, though it is believed that the limited scope of this undertaking will enable the codifier to report at the next session of Congress.

(2) The Public Printer is authorized to do the printing.

(3) The compensation is limited to $3,000.

(4) It is provided that 50 per cent. of the sum expended be paid by the District.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Now, Mr. Speaker, that report, which I had the honor to submit, as will be perceived, is a very brief one and a very matter-of-fact statement of the many reasons why some such legislation should be enacted. The bill empowers the court—the supreme court of the District—to appoint some one to frame a criminal code for the District.

There have been many times in the history of this District when efforts were made to get up a criminal as well as a civil code; but failure has always followed such efforts, as is stated in the report. Such efforts have always fallen still-born. That would be the case again, no doubt, in this effort but for the fact that because the criminal laws in this District are at this time in some respects barbarous, obsolete, and inadequate, it has grown to be a public sentiment, a clamor in favor of some such measure.

More than a year ago the Committee on the District of Columbia had this matter brought to its attention, and finally decided that the supreme court of the District could properly appoint a suitable person who, for a moderately reasonable sum or compensation, could take up the criminal code, which is now such a crying necessity, and that the other larger work which is so much demanded here should be left to the future. After a careful inquiry the committee believe that, with the basis of the code in the State from which this law has been largely derived, aided by codifications of the criminal laws of other States of this country, by the recent criminal act, for instance, in the State of New York, if you please, or Stephen's English Criminal Code, in the course of a year such a proper person could report to Congress a criminal code, not as an experiment, but one based upon existing law—the only way in which a code could and should properly be made—and that it may be done and done promptly and well, and when so done this law, which has been so long wanted and which has never heretofore been provided, notwithstanding the repeated efforts to have such a measure in this District, will meet the requirements of the people and afford relief where now there is none. It provides also that it shall remain for the consideration of Congress until approved or rejected.

I reserve the remainder of my time, Mr. Speaker, and unless some gentleman is opposed to this provision I shall move the previous question upon the adoption of the bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. May I ask the gentleman from Maryland a question?

Mr. MCCOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. COX, of New York. The publication of this code will cost a good deal of money. It is provided that it shall be done by the Public Printer. Is it proposed to divide that expense with the District also?

Mr. MCCOMAS. The act itself provides that the Public Printer shall print this code. But I will say to the gentleman from New York that as it is simply a criminal code, it will necessarily be brief. It does not undertake to embrace the civil provisions of the law within it. It is simply a criminal code, and the Public Printer, as the bill provides, shall do the printing of it.

Mr. COX, of New York. But there is another provision, which provides that the cost of carrying out the bill shall be defrayed equally by the Government and the District of Columbia.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX, of New York. Now, does that provision apply also to the printing?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I think not to the printing.

Mr. COX, of New York. Suppose you amend it in that way.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I will accept that amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman from Maryland permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCCOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is there any special reason why this appointing power shall be conferred upon the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia rather than upon the President of the United States?

Mr. MCCOMAS. If the gentleman will look at the bill, and at the time of its introduction, he will see that it was presented several months ago, and the committee thought it better that no political consideration should govern or hamper it. It was the desire of the committee not to create any claim of partisanship in connection with the appointment. It was expressly the sense of the committee that, being purely a local matter, it would be better for the judges of the supreme court of the District, those who are to administer the criminal law, to make the appointment of some person who in their judgment would be qualified to perform the labor assigned to him; and I think my friend from Pennsylvania will agree with me that it does seem wise to have the provision remain just as it is.

Mr. HOPKINS. Inasmuch as the President of the United States selects these very judges with a view to their fitness, he is certainly competent to select the subordinate officers. I move, therefore, to amend by striking out in the third and fourth lines the words "justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia" and insert "President of the United States."

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Maryland to have yielded the floor so that an amendment can be offered at this time?

Mr. MCCOMAS. No, sir; I retain the floor and yielded simply to any gentleman who desires to make an inquiry.

I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the committee would not consent to any amendment affecting the mode of appointment. The purpose was, as I have said, one year or more ago, to avoid any political appointment, the object being to avoid making a place for some political favorite, and the judgment of the committee being that the court might find some member of the bar who would be competent to at once proceed to the discharge of the duty, that thereby the work would be done systematically and rapidly. It is desirable that this shall be brought before Congress at its next session.

I will assent to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX]. But really, Mr. Speaker, in looking at the bill, it does seem to me that the bill itself provides for the printing in the form in which the gentleman from New York would have it done.

I ask the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX]. I find on looking at the bill that my statement was not quite broad enough. The third section already provides, as the distinguished gentleman suggests, that the Public Printer shall do the printing. Therefore the amendment will not be required. The printing is only for Congress, because the work has to be submitted to Congress; and that is the usual mode. I hope that is satisfactory to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. It is not satisfactory at all. The printing to be done inures to the benefit of the District, and the rule has been applied to all expenditures for the District that one moiety shall be borne by the District and one moiety by the United States. I have prepared an amendment providing that the expense of one-half the printing also shall be paid by the District.

Mr. McCOMAS. I do not object to that amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. That will be, I think, a very unusual provision. We have bills printed every day relating to the District, the expense of which is not charged to the District.

Mr. COX, of New York. But this may be a very large code.

Mr. KEIFER. It will be in the nature of a bill when brought before Congress. The Public Printer is ready to print bills relating to the District of Columbia or anything else.

Mr. COX, of New York. I remember a code relating to the District of Columbia which covered some five or six hundred pages; and that code, I believe, eventuated in nothing.

Mr. McCOMAS. I assent to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, and upon that and the bill I move the previous question.

Mr. OATES. I ask the gentleman to withhold the motion for the previous question for a moment.

Mr. McCOMAS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

Mr. OATES. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maryland if this commissioner, for whose appointment the bill provides, is not a mere compiler of existing law. Is that the intention of the bill?

Mr. McCOMAS. That is the intention of the bill.

Mr. OATES. Then, it seems to me, the bill should be amended. The language is:

To prepare a code of criminal law for the said District of Columbia.

It does not say to compile the existing criminal law, or the criminal law at present in force in the District of Columbia.

Mr. McCOMAS. I now understand the gentleman from Alabama. This is to enable the codifier to prepare a criminal code for the District of Columbia, taking the old laws with whatever additions may seem wise. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. OATES. That seems not exactly consistent with the third section:

That said commissioner or codifier so appointed, &c.

Mr. McCOMAS. He is to prepare a code. The bill authorizes some one to be appointed to prepare a code, and if my friend from Alabama will look at the first section he will find that ambiguity can not occur, because the commissioner is authorized to prepare a code of criminal law for the District of Columbia.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments reported by the committee were adopted.

The following amendment, offered by Mr. COX, of New York, was also adopted:

Add to the bill the following:
"Provided further, That one-half of the expense of printing said code shall be paid by the District of Columbia."

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCOMAS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROMOTION OF ANATOMICAL SCIENCE, ETC.

Mr. BARBOUR. I now call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 5650) for the promotion of anatomical science, and to prevent the desecration of graves.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That any public officer or officers, whether directors, trustees, superintendents, wardens, keepers, or managers, having lawful charge of or control over any hospital, prison, almshouse, jail, morgue, or asylum within the District of Columbia, may deliver to the duly-authorized agent of any medical college or colleges in the said District of Columbia the bodies of such deceased persons as are required to be buried at the public expense, said bodies to be distributed among the several colleges equitably, the number assigned to each being proportioned to that of its students: Provided, however, That if the deceased person, during his last illness, of his own accord, requested to be buried, or if, within twenty-four hours after his death, any person claiming to be, and satisfying the authorities that he is, of kindred to the deceased, asks to have the body buried, or if such deceased person was a stranger or traveler who suddenly died, the body shall not be so delivered, but shall be buried.

SEC. 2. That every physician or surgeon, before receiving such dead body, shall give to the officers surrendering the same to him a sufficient bond that each body shall be used only for the promotion of anatomical and surgical knowledge within the District of Columbia, and that after having been so used the remains thereof shall be decently buried; and whosoever shall use such body or bodies for any purpose other than that aforesaid, or shall remove the same beyond the limits of the said District of Columbia, and whosoever shall sell or buy such body or bodies, or in any way traffic in the same, or who shall disturb or remove bodies from graves in which they have been buried, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall on conviction be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three years, at hard labor, in the District (or city) jail.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the committee's report upon the bill just passed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred House bill 5650, entitled "A bill for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves," having had the same under consideration, report it back with a favorable recommendation.

The object of the bill is twofold: First, and chiefly, to provide sufficient dissecting material for the medical colleges of the District of Columbia; and secondly, and indirectly, to afford better protection to the graves of the dead from desecration.

There are now several flourishing medical schools in Washington well established, and one or more of them of long standing. It is known to all that such institutions can not be carried on or proper training for the practice of medicine and surgery be given without ample experience in the dissection of the human cadaver. This fact is recognized and approved by all, and yet public opinion as strongly approves and demands stringent laws for the punishment of the desecration of graves in order to procure the necessary dissecting material. Hence the laws of the District are very severe, and properly so, against the crime of grave-robbing. With such laws in operation and such necessities for the schools of medicine, the authorities of the District are compelled either to wink at this offense or seriously to cripple, if not to destroy, the efficiency and success of these schools. Furthermore, the heads of these institutions, professors and students of science, are compelled to supply their admitted necessities by confederating with and employing professional grave-robbers, and constantly to incur the risk of detection and criminal prosecution; and it being known in a community that the trade of resurrecting bodies for dissection is a common one, kindred and friends are frequently tortured with anxiety lest the hand of the resurrectionist shall remove the bodies of their dead.

This bill is intended to relieve from such fears—to do away with the necessity or temptation for violating the laws, and at the same time in an open and legal way to provide the requisite dissecting material for the study and advancement of anatomical science in the District. A careful comparison with the statutes of some of the States shows its provisions to be prudently and aptly framed, and intended to accomplish the purpose in view in a manner as little repellant to public sentiment and sensibility as practicable.

DENTISTRY IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BARBOUR. I now call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 7895) for the regulation of the practice of dentistry in the District of Columbia, and for the protection of the people of said District from empiricism in relation thereto.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be unlawful for any person to practice dentistry for compensation in the District of Columbia unless such person shall have received a certificate from the board of examiners hereinafter established, granted upon examination or upon presentation to said board of a diploma from the faculty or other proper persons of a dental college duly and legally incorporated in the United States, in which college there was, at the time of the issue of such diploma, a full course of lectures and instructions in dental surgery: Provided, That nothing in this section shall apply to persons now engaged in the practice of dentistry in this District who shall be registered as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall, immediately on the passage of this act, and in December of each and every year thereafter, appoint a board of examiners, who shall at the time of their appointment be practicing dentists in the District of Columbia, and who shall serve until their successors are appointed. That said examiners at their first meeting shall organize by electing one of their number president, and one secretary, and one treasurer; that they shall hold at least two regular meetings each year, and as much oftener as may be necessary; that a majority of their number shall constitute a quorum, and that a full record of their proceedings shall be kept in a bound book procured for that purpose, which shall be at all proper times open for public inspection.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of said examiners to issue certificates to all applicants who shall present diplomas of the character and kind described in section 1 of this act, and to all others who shall, in the judgment of a majority of said examiners, upon examination of the applicants, be found competent to practice dentistry.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of every person who is engaged in the practice of dentistry in this District, within ninety days from the date of the taking effect of this act, to cause his name, residence, and place of business to be registered by said board of examiners in a book kept for that purpose, naming the length of time he or she has been engaged in the practice in this District, and, if a graduate of a dental college, the college where graduating, for which a fee of 50 cents shall be paid by the person so registering. Every person so registering who is engaged in the practice of dentistry in the District aforesaid at the date of the passage of this act may continue to practice without incurring the penalties or liabilities of this act.

SEC. 5. That no person whose name is not registered as prescribed in the preceding section shall be permitted to practice dentistry in this District until such person shall have received from said board of examiners a certificate based upon an examination or upon a diploma as before defined.

SEC. 6. That the board of examiners shall receive from each practitioner of dentistry registering under this act a fee of 50 cents, and from each person having no diploma and receiving a certificate upon examination a fee of $5, and from each person receiving a certificate upon a diploma a fee of $3, all of which fees so received shall be paid to the secretary of the board and entered of record, and shall be applied to the payment of the actual expenses incurred under this act upon order of the board. The members of the board shall receive no compensation for their time or services in the discharge of the duties prescribed by this act.

SEC. 7. That any person who shall practice dentistry in the District of Columbia without having complied with the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $200, and in default of the payment of such fine shall be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than ninety days, said fines, when collected, to be paid into the public-school fund of the District of Columbia: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent surgeons and physicians from extracting teeth and prescribing or treating diseases of the mouth.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. If there be no explanation desired, I move the previous question.

Mr. STORM. As I understand, this bill does not interfere with dentists now practicing in the District of Columbia without a diploma?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. It does not. It provides, however, for their registering.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. In the last line I desire to make a verbal correction. The word "for" should be inserted after the word "prescribing."

There being no objection, the amendment was made.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WORTHINGTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 5735) granting a pension to Margaret Daily;
An act (H. R. 3382) granting a pension to Albert Brant;
An act (H. R. 4094) granting a pension to Henry Alden;
An act (H. R. 2440) granting a pension to Usebus Sweet;
An act (H. R. 452) granting a pension to Frederick Corfe;
An act (H. R. 3177) granting a pension to Charles F. Paris; and An act (H. R. 3210) for the relief of Jacob Hoerth.

WILLIAM B. MOSES.

Mr. BARBOUR. I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1148) for the relief of William B. Moses, and that the House proceed to consider the same.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claim of William B. Moses, of Washington, D. C., for certain goods and merchandise furnished for the use of the orphans' court of said District, under authority of the act of Congress approved July 28, 1866, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, referred to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, with authority to examine and audit said claim; and if any amount is found to be justly due the said Moses, such amount, not exceeding the sum of $313, shall be included in the estimates to be submitted to Congress for the expenditures of the District of Columbia for the next fiscal year, and paid out of such moneys as may be appropriated therefor.

Mr. BARBOUR. This bill has been reported adversely by the Committee on the District of Columbia. I move that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM BOWEN.

Mr. BARBOUR. I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1785) for the relief of William Bowen, and that the bill be now taken up for consideration in the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William Bowen, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,749.80, the same being the amount of the balance due him for filling up and draining certain lots in the city of Washington, under contract with the board of health of the District of Columbia, during the years 1871, 1872, and 1873, the said lots being located in the squares numbered 549, 849, and in the square north of square 853, and in square 996, the filling and draining thereof being ordered by said board to abate a public nuisance, and in the interest of the public health.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the claim of William Bowen for $3,749.80, as a balance due him for abating certain nuisances under authority of the late board of health of the District of Columbia, be referred to the Court of Claims for its decision and adjudication upon the merits of the claim according to law and the practice of said court, without regard to the statute of limitations or the conclusiveness of a certain receipt signed by said Bowen, in 1875, in full settlement for all claims against the District of Columbia for said work."

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has passed a bill identical in terms with the substitute just read.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The proposition, as I understand, is to refer this claim to the Court of Claims.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Yes, sir. The committee now asks that the House bill be laid on the table, and that the House proceed to consider Senate bill 1625.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly; and the bill (S. 1625) was taken from the Speaker's table and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claim of William Bowen for $3,749.80, as a balance due him for abating certain nuisances under authority of the late board of health of the District of Columbia, be referred to the Court of Claims for its decision and adjudication upon the merits of the claim according to law and the practice of said court, without regard to the statute of limitations or the conclusiveness of a certain receipt signed by said Bowen, in 1875, in full settlement for all claims against the District of Columbia for said work.

The bill was read three times, and passed.

Mr. WORTHINGTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR. I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 3108) in order that we may act upon an amendment of the Senate. It is a bill to protect fish in the Potomac River in the District of Columbia, and to provide a spawning-ground for shad and herring in the said Potomac River.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following:

"SEC. 3. That from and after two months from the date of the passage of this act it shall be unlawful to allow any tar, oil, or other waste products of any gas-works, or of works engaged in using such products, to flow into or to be deposited in Rock Creek or the Potomac River, or into any pipe or conduit leading to the same; and any one guilty of violating this section shall be fined not less than $10 nor more than $100 for each and every offense, to be prosecuted for and recovered as provided in the preceding section."

Mr. BARBOUR. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment proposed by the Senate to this bill is objectionable. It is represented by the commissioners of the District of Columbia that the provision for cutting off the flow of certain matters from the gas-works might operate to shut up the works or to interfere materially with the lighting of the city. I move, therefore, that the House non-concur in the amendment, and ask a conference with the Senate.

The motion of Mr. BARBOUR was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAMMOND) announced the appointment of Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. SPRIGGS, and Mr. MCCOMAS as conferees upon the part of the House.

EASTERN PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

Mr. BARBOUR. I move to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 2045) for the relief of the Eastern Presbyterian Church, in the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all taxes, together with the interest and penalties, now due and unpaid, for the years 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, and 1883, upon lots 34, 35, 36, 37, and 38, in square 891, in the city of Washington, D. C., now occupied by the frame church known as the Eastern Presbyterian church, be, and the same are hereby, remitted.

The bill was read three times, and passed.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR. I believe this concludes the business that the Committee on the District of Columbia desires to offer to-day.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] who has charge of the bill was here until a moment ago, but as he does not happen to be here at this instant, I have taken the floor to make this motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7857) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salary of the consul-general at Melbourne, $4,500.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was under consideration on Saturday last, at the time the committee rose we were occupied with the second paragraph under Schedule B. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who made the point of order upon the provision for consul-general at Madrid in the first paragraph under Schedule B.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct, and the Clerk will read the second paragraph under Schedule B.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of the agents and consuls-general at London, Paris, Havana, and Rio de Janeiro, at $6,000 each, $24,000.

Mr. HITT. I desire to offer an amendment: in line 130 to strike out the words "agents and." The word "agents," as here employed, I understand is intended to mean diplomatic agents; that is to say, our consuls at London, Paris, and Rio de Janeiro, where we have now ministers, are to be made quasi-ministers; and the ordinarily recognized commercial agents of this Government, or consuls, it is now proposed shall be placed beside our ministers and clothed with diplomatic powers. It will be certain to produce confusion. Diplomatic agents have been appointed heretofore, but never in such positions as these. Diplomatic agents, under that name and title, have been sent by our Government to countries which were semi-independent, like Egypt. By custom this title has come to mean this class of officers, not quite ministers, accredited to governments not quite independent; but the proposition here is to put near our minister at London and by his side a commercial agent accredited as a diplomatic officer, authorized to hold communication with a minister of foreign affairs in England, France, or Brazil. It can only result in conflict of authority, confusion of functions, perhaps quarrels. The words mean nothing or they mean mischief, and I hope, therefore, they will be stricken out.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Missouri who has charge of the bill is not present. He has been here all day in the expectation of calling up this bill and proceeding with its consideration. Now, this amendment affects a part of the bill which, in the subcommittee as well as in the general committee, was adopted after most careful consideration. I hope, therefore, that the words will not be stricken out.

Mr. BURNES. I trust the amendment of my friend from Illinois will not be sustained by the committee. Due consideration has been given to this subject not only by the members of the subcommittee but by the members of the committee generally and by many of the most experienced diplomats in the House and out of it. No difficulty, it is apprehended, can arise in consequence of the insertion of these words. I trust that the committee will see the propriety of retaining them.

Mr. HITT'S amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of thirteen consular clerks, to be appointed under section 1704 of the Revised Statutes, $13,000.

Mr. HITT. I move to strike out "thirteen," in line 149, and to insert "in pursuance of the provision of section 1704 of the Revised Statutes and section 5 of the consular and diplomatic act approved June 11, 1874, of eight;" and, in lines 150 and 151, to strike out "to be appointed under section 1704 of the Revised States, $13,000," and insert "at $1,200 each per annum, and five consular clerks at $1,000 per annum, $14,600;" so it will read:

For salaries in pursuance of the provisions of section 1704 of the Revised Statutes and section 5 of the consular and diplomatic appropriation act approved June 11, 1874, of eight consular clerks at $1,200 each per annum, and five consular clerks at $1,000 each per annum, $14,600.

Mr. HOLMAN. So far as that amendment is predicated on the appropriation act of 1874 I make the point of order that it is new legislation; so far as it applies to the consular offices provided by the Revised Statutes I presume the point of order will not lie.

Mr. HITT. The act of 1874 provides that clerks who have served five years creditably shall thereafter receive $1,200 instead of $1,000 per annum. It is general legislation incorporated in an appropriation bill, and has been followed ever since. This provision for their pay is made in view of the fact that although at this time there are only seven clerks entitled on account of five years' service to the additional pay of $200, yet during the fiscal year another will reach that term of service, and so eight are provided for in the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will concede the gentleman may be right if the appropriation act of 1874 contains independent legislation and provides for these offices.

Mr. HITT. It does in that paragraph provide general legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wants to see the act of 1874.

Mr. BURNES. I am satisfied the gentleman from Illinois is right as to this amendment. I hope it will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist on his point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. If the salaries were simply provided by way of appropriation I do insist on my point of order, but if, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois, there is an independent legislative provision in that act, I will not do so.

Mr. HITT. I have not the text before me, but the words contained in the appropriation act are in terms of general legislation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest the paragraph be passed over for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

The clerk read as follows:

CHINA.

Foochow; Canton; Amoy; Tien-Tsin; Chin-Kiang.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting after the word "Foochow," the word "Hankow." Then you make this bill conform to the current law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that provided by law?

Mr. HITT. As I have said, it will make the bill coincide with the law as we passed it last year.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that is subject to the point of order.

Mr. RYAN. That is the law for the current year. Hankow is simply provided for in this amendment as it is provided for in the current law. It is the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the appropriation for the current year contained the proposed amendment. If that is the case the point of order is not well taken, and the motion will be submitted to the committee.

The Clerk will again report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RYAN. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the committee ought to be a little better informed, and should understand the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois and the reason for it before being called to vote upon it. I do not know who the consul is at Hankow. I do not know his name; but I do know that the committee has taken Hankow from the thirty-five-hundred-dollar class and put it in the fifteen-hundred-dollar class. I do not believe we acted wisely in doing so. We have made this change in the face of the fact that Hankow is a place of growing commercial importance. Recently a large line of steamers—twenty-six in number—engaged in the river and coastwise commerce between Hankow and the coast, have passed into American hands and are now flying the American flag. It is the duty of the consul at this point to attend to all clearances and entries and all matters incident thereto in addition to his other duties as consul.

Mr. HITT. May I suggest to my friend from Kansas whether it is not true that that line of steamers to which he refers runs directly from Hankow to Shanghai?

Mr. RYAN. Yes, sir; and, as I stated a moment ago, since the last appropriation bill was passed, and within the last six months, in fact, that line of steamers has passed into the hands of American citizens, and they are running under the American flag.

But, as I have said, it is a place of growing importance and second only, in point of commercial magnitude, to Shanghai itself. I can not understand, with all of these facts confronting us, why it is that this consulship should be degraded, that the consulship at that point should be reduced from $3,500 per annum to $1,500 per annum.

Mr. REED. Why, it makes the appropriation bill $2,000 less, and that seems to be a sound reason. [Laughter.]

Mr. RYAN. That is the only reason that I know of, but I do not believe the House will regard it as a sufficient one. I think it important that the House should know of all these facts before we are called to vote upon the proposition.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, the Department of State recommended that this post, instead of being reduced, should be raised to $4,000 per annum. That recommendation is contained in a recent communication from the Secretary of State to this body.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state to the committee that I can not share the opinion as expressed by my distinguished colleague from Kansas, for the reason that the record from the State Department shows that instead of a gradually increasing commerce there, it appears to be a gradually diminishing commerce at Hankow. At all events, the returns from that point show the enormous sum of $716 in 1883, and in the past year $556. Against these receipts we pay a salary of $3,500. We lost by exchange $59.83, and we lost by contingent expenses for three-quarters of the year; and although the year expired on the 30th of June last, the consul at that point has not been able to complete his report for that year. But with receipts of $556, a diminished amount of receipts, there is an increase in the amount of expenditures, and I apprehend that it will be found there is a gradual diminishing of the volume of business.

In addition, sir, this is not all that we pay for the luxury of a consul-general at Hankow. There are $1,750 more that that gentleman receives, as will be found on page 28 of the report of the Fifth Auditor. Seven hundred and fifty dollars of that is for an interpreter, and $1,000 for a consular court. Now, I undertake to say, sir, that it is within the knowledge of my friend from Illinois that this consul has been incurring these expenses at a time when neither business at his consulate nor his own official action justify the wisdom of the maintenance of a consulate there at all. I will go further and show, with reference to the recommendations of the Department, and I apprehend it will not be denied by those who have communication with the Department, that it has been known, well-known, in official circles that this consul has received this $1,000 a year extra by the use of the name of a woman, who supplanted the consul's wife and took her place, and whose receipt is in the State Department for the $1,000 appropriated for the marshal of the consular court. That marshal, in short, was a woman, who supplanted the wife of the consul, his wife having been returned to this country.

But now, sir, we come to the most serious consideration, and that is with regard to this line of steamers. I would like my esteemed friend from Kansas to show us why it is that so suddenly a line of steamers is established between Shanghai and Hankow? Does not my colleague know that a state of war existing between France and China has led to the sudden transformation or the sudden uprising of the American flag as a means of protection to a foreign bottom and a foreign interest? We have no interest in the line of steamers, either in its commerce, its ownership, or its business. And I would like my friend to explain to us why it is we should be so anxious to protect and preserve interests that seek our flag in a cowardly manner in the hour of danger and abandon it at the earliest moment when it can be of some service to our commerce.

Mr. REED. How do they get our flag over foreign-built ships?

Mr. BURNES. I believe I can not answer my friend's question now.

Mr. REED. I was afraid you could not.

Mr. CHACE. Allow me to supplement that question. Here is a statement made on the floor of the House that a foreign navigation company are sailing their ships under the American flag. I think it is really due to the committee that it be explained how that is done. Where do they get their register? I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not stop here with this statement, which is a very remarkable one.

Mr. BURNES. I will explain to the gentleman from Rhode Island, who seems to be anxious to understand this question, that I do not make this statement; but the statement has been made and has gone the rounds of the country; and I ask my friend from Kansas, as he brought in this line of steamers as a reason why we should continue this consulate on its present footing—I ask him to explain whether or not it is true, as alleged in the public press of the country and believed to be a fact, that the American flag is used in some way or other—how I shall not stop now to inquire—for the purpose of protecting interests not our own.

Mr. RYAN. I assume that the commercial transaction by which this line of steamers passed into American hands and is now sailing under the American flag was made in good faith until I have some better evidence of the contrary than mere rumor. I assume it is an honest commercial transaction and not done for any such purpose as indicated or intimated by the gentleman from Missouri. Whether it is for a dishonest purpose or not I know not; but I do know that there has been no evidence adduced other than mere newspaper rumor, upon which a committee of this House should not rely, nor should this House rely upon such for one moment in considering any legislation.

Mr. RANDALL. Will my friend from Kansas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RYAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the transfer of these vessels to Russell & Co. did not take place immediately prior to or immediately after the breaking out of the war between France and China.

Mr. RYAN. Very likely; but that does not imply any bad faith. It may be that those who were engaged in that commerce found it to their interest, in view of embarrassments growing out of the war, to sell out, and to sell out in good faith; and the circumstances may have been such that Americans could have made the purchase by reason of such facts to their great advantage, and for that reason made the purchase. But that does not detract from the honesty and good faith of the transaction.

I do undertake to say here that we ought to legislate with reference to the character and importance of this consulate, not with regard to the character of the incumbent. It may be that the insinuation that the gentleman from Missouri has made here is correct. It may be that this officer has been guilty of immorality. I do not know it. I have never heard his name. I care no more about him than I do about any other American citizen.

But I have it from the State Department that it is not true in any respect that he has been guilty of the immoral conduct charged here against him; that it is a calumny. Whether it is or not I know not, and for the purpose of this motion I care not. If he be an improper person, it is the duty of the Department to remove him and put a competent and suitable man in his place, for this officer holds in his trust some of the most important interests of mankind. He has jurisdiction, judicial power, judicial functions of the greatest magnitude to perform, involving the private rights of American citizens as between themselves and as between them and citizens of China. And he has not only those powers, but he has criminal jurisdiction to try for offenses from the least to the highest, involving the penalty of even death itself. I say that a person occupying such an exalted position, who has such high trusts in his charge, ought to be competent for the position; and I doubt not, if he is an improper person, inasmuch as the millennium of the civil service is about to dawn upon us, we shall have a change, and a competent and proper man will take the place, and such a one will not be overcompensated if the motion of my friend from Illinois shall prevail.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not propose to vote against the amendment for any reason connected with this line of steamers or for any reason connected with the immorality or alleged immorality of the present incumbent. But the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] has shown that there is no occasion for the continuation of this consulate in the first class; that instead of the business, as shown by the fees, having increased at that point, it has actually decreased, and therefore the consulate can safely be placed where the committee has placed it, in the other class.

Mr. HITT. As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] referred to me as knowing that the disbursements made at this consulate were not justified in any degree by the business of the office or the duties of the consul, I will say, on the contrary, that I have had knowledge in the past of the great importance of this consulate, where the business of half a million of people with this country has to be conducted through one officer. The number of invoices and the amount of fees, as cited by the gentleman, constitute no test whatever of the quantity of business. One invoice for tea may amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars in value, while an invoice from Paris or Brussels may cover a few dollars' worth of trivial articles—toys, ornaments, &c., and the fee is the same in both cases.

I remember, too, that in that far-away place, in that semi-barbarous country, our consul is clothed with powers which require intelligence, discretion, and experience that you can not buy with $1,500, the salary for Hankow fixed in another part of this bill. It is no vain declamation when my friend from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] says that this consul has power of life and death. The consul has this power; it has been exercised. The consuls in repeated instances there in that Chinese world have tried and condemned American citizens. I could name cases where the consul tried a man, sentenced him to death, and hanged him at the consulate till he was dead. Will you clothe an officer with such terrible judicial powers when you know that with the pay allowed it is utterly impossible to obtain a man versed in jurisprudence, a man of experience as a judge, or even intelligent in the most elementary principles of law. If the duties require a man of ability and knowledge, the pay should command such a man. This consul, too, exercises his duties in an expensive and remote country. Abolish the office altogether, or allow a salary that will enable the President to send a man there who will know enough not to blunder; and a blunder in such a man, from whose action by our law there is no appeal, is a crime somewhere.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURNES. I desire, in justice to myself, to say a single word of explanation, and then I will yield the floor. In reply to my friend from Kansas I will not say anything more than I deem absolutely indispensable in justice to myself.

The gentleman says he has been informed by the State Department that it is not true that a woman received this salary of $1,000.

Mr. RYAN. No, sir; I do not wish to be misrepresented.

Mr. BURNES. I understood the gentleman that way.

Mr. RYAN. I said I had been informed at the State Department that the statement that this officer was guilty of any immorality was not true.

Mr. BURNES. Oh, well, it makes no difference——

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Missouri never alleged that.

Mr. BURNES. So far as the play on words is concerned, a thing may not be immoral in China but may be immoral elsewhere. But I desire to state what is well known to gentlemen on this floor, that officers high in the diplomatic service of the Government and members of the State Department themselves have conceded the fact that this woman of bad character has been maintained and did receive this sum of $1,000.

Mr. CANNON. Right there I would like to ask my friend from Missouri a simple question. I do not know this consul, not even his name, nor his wife, nor the other woman. [Laughter.] But I would like to know where in the record there is any proof of what the gentleman states concerning the private affairs of this consul.

Mr. BURNES. Well, sir, it is unwritten evidence. Such things are not usually committed to print.

Mr. REED. I should like to know how a foreign ship gets an American flag under our statutes. The circumstance is curious to me after all the fighting we have been doing here about it.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman, I will eliminate from the question now before the committee the immorality of the consul and the woman who seems to be connected with it, and will accept the declaration of the gentleman who has charge of this bill as to what occurred at this consulate. Since I have been a member of this House I have constantly heard entreaties for legislation to increase our commerce and trade with foreign countries.

Having lived abroad for four years of my life, I came back to my country with the impression that our trade, commerce, and market for our surplus productions must grow up under the fostering care of this central Government. Appointing a consul in China, however moral, or taking a woman, however pure, as a marshal of a court which is clothed with the power to try men, deprive them of their personal rights, and even to hang them at their doors, as is asserted and not contradicted, will not make you markets for your surplus products. Great Britain understands this question perfectly, and has pursued this policy for centuries to unexampled wealth and power through all the legislation of that great country. Through the woof and web of her policy is woven, as a golden thread, the idea of securing a market for British products, until every country, every state, every corporation in the world that needs money is held under the mortgage of that great commercial power and people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what did they do in order to make markets for their products? They seized Malta and Gibraltar, and the Cape of Good Hope when it was on the highway to the commerce of the East, the keys to the commerce of the Mediterranean, and when French energy and science, under the lead of De Lesseps, built the Suez Canal to shorten communication between the Mediterranean and the Red Seas, Beaconsfield, the most distinguished prime minister of Great Britain since the age of William Pitt, by British money took the canal into British possession. And so they have acted until they have gathered up into their hands the trade of the Orient and of the far away isles of the sea. They take care, sir, that their merchants and their mercantile marine shall be protected wherever they may go.

Why, Mr. Chairman, from Quebec to the uttermost parts of this continent lines of steamers run as regularly as they do between Liverpool and New York. They have established markets everywhere for their trade. They trade with the people in every portion of the North and South American continents. They give their consuls power, and there is a British man-of-war always in the neighborhood where their trade is carried on.

Why, sir, they get more than one-half of the trade of South America, the total of which amounts to $694,793,000, when we ought to have the whole of it. We get, on the contrary, only 5 per cent. of it all.

I like the Monroe doctrine very much, but I would like that doctrine better if it gave us markets for the sale of our surplus products, the ingenuity of our people, our improvements in machinery, which we have improved to such an extent that seven-tenths of the productions of Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Massachusetts to-day need no protection while they do need a market. [Applause.]

How does England secure these markets, and how does it maintain its trade? By subsidizing lines of steamers; by securing the carriage and quick transmission of mails; by protecting British merchants and marine everywhere.

It has become the habit of the South American people to trade with Great Britain and not with us. We pay Brazil $48,000,000 a year, and yet we do not sell $9,000,000 a year to her. A man who goes to the store for supplies for his family soon gets into the habit of going to a particular store where he knows the merchant and is satisfied that trade is carried on fairly. So with communities and nations. The South American people have been in the habit of trading with Great Britain. The British have that trade to-day. Now let us see if we can not manage to take it out of their hands. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CURTIN. Very well; I am much obliged to my friend, because that is the way it seems to me in parliamentary language gentlemen are approached; but inasmuch as the gentleman is my friend I will call him that, and I do not call friends of mine who are not my friends. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that appointing consuls or increasing their salaries will increase our trade. I approve fully of the legislation which sent a commission to ascertain whether we could not extend railroads into South America on either side of the Andes, so that we might get increased production and offer to the world its riches as they come from labor, while at the same time we might secure that market.

When I lived in Russia, holding the commission of my Government, the cholera prevailed at Cronstadt, and I was informed that American sailors were dying. I applied in order to get American sailors put into British hospitals, but it was refused. A noble-hearted Scotchman, Sir Andrew Buchanan, who had lived in our country and was then ambassador at St. Petersburg, had imbibed some of our ideas, went down to Cronstadt and succeeded in having American sailors admitted into the British hospitals. Not one of our American sailors died afterward.

Wherever there is commerce of Great Britain you will find hospitals. Wherever they trade you will find means afforded for the succor and protection of their subjects. You will find lines of steamers touching in the Orient and away off in the isles of the sea and in our own country at stated intervals. The habit of trade becomes to be such that they absorb it all. If you want trade you can not make it by taking from the salary of a little consulate or by increasing a salary, or by frittering away the time of the House in a struggle as to an immoral man or an improper woman who happens to be in office. [Laughter and applause.]

The great question is the question of trade for this great people. [Applause.] It is a question of giving the nation what it desires. It is extension and protection of our commerce and trade throughout the world.

Henry Clay, that immortal man, whose great heart always beat in sympathy with the American people, that great leader of the American sentiment, once said in the Senate of the United States that if this great Government could protect the person of an American citizen under the Constitution and the teachings of the apostles of liberty of the Revolution, of the men who framed our Constitution, they had the right and it was their duty to protect his interest and his business. [Applause.] That is the true sentiment of the American people.

You talk about jobs! Let them make a job. The Suez Canal belongs to Great Britain. She has the trade of the East. She has most of our trade. We are decaying on the high seas. We need legislation to protect our trade and to extend it. We should have the trade of South America, of which we have to-day less than 6 per cent. Of all things I would strengthen the consular service of the country, not because a needy politician requires an office, but I would elevate men who are qualified for such places and who would creditably represent the commerce of our people. I would put there the very best men in the country so as to secure for our people the control of commerce and trade of the countries to which they are accredited. No one should be appointed as a consul who can not speak the language of commerce in the country or city where he is to serve.

Now, I have expressed these sentiments not so much on the section of the bill under consideration but for the reason that I desire to express them at some time in this House in this debate; and having expressed them, whether I make any impression on the enlightened audience to which I have the honor to speak or not, at least I will be accredited with giving my experience and my belief as to the duty of the American Congress in enlarging the power of the Government and in promoting the general welfare of the people. [Great applause.]

Mr. RANDALL. I join very heartily in the patriotic sentiments just expressed by my colleague from Pennsylvania, and think he has but expressed the views of the country. But still I join in the doubt that he has uttered as to the appropriateness of his language in connection with the amendment proposed. This is a proposition not to destroy any consulate but to regulate the salary. The committee have deemed that the salary now received is too much, and have therefore lowered it; that is all.

Mr. CURTIN. I beg my friend's pardon; I do agree with the committee on that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 44, noes 67.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

PERU.

Callao.

Class III.—At $3,000 per annum:

GREAT BRITAIN.

Ottawa; Manchester; Glasgow; Bradford; Demerara; Belfast; Singapore.

FRENCH DOMINIONS.

Havre.

SPANISH DOMINIONS.

Matanzas (Cuba).

MEXICO.

Vera Cruz.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desired to make a question of order on line 164 of this bill. There was so much confusion during the reading of this paragraph by the Clerk that I confess I was not able to follow it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the point of order of the gentleman in view of the statement which he makes.

Mr. HOLMAN. In line 164 of the bill Singapore is increased in this appropriation by the sum of $500. That consulate has heretofore belonged to the fourth class, with a salary of $2,500 a year. The effect of the change, the placing of the consulate in the other class, where it now stands on the bill, is simply to increase the salary $500. I believe that Singapore is provided in the present law as of the fourth class.

Mr. BURNES. Will my friend yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURNES. I desire simply to say the amount we have raised the fee of the consulate at that point is saved by the allowance of clerk-hire, for reasons which were plain to the committee. I suggest, therefore, that if the gentleman insists upon the point of order I shall be compelled to move to make the appropriation for clerk-hire the same in amount as the last appropriation bill, which will not be so beneficial to the country and certainly will not save anything in that direction.

Mr. HOLMAN. I agree to that; but the clerk-hire is a less item than this. However, upon the statement of the gentleman from Missouri, I do not think that I shall press the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA.

Colon (Aspinwall).

JAPAN.

Nagasaki; Osaka and Hiogo.

CHILI.

Valparaiso.

BELGIUM.

Antwerp.

Class IV.—At $2,500 per annum:

GREAT BRITAIN.

Tunstall; Birmingham; Sheffield; Dundee; Leith; Nottingham; Victoria (British Columbia).

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I can hardly keep the run of this reading. I had intended to make a point of order on line 178, the con-sulate at Antwerp. That consul has been heretofore placed in the fourth class, at $2,500 a year.

Mr. BURNES. I must insist that the gentleman made the point of order too late. My friend did not rise at the time this provision was read by the Clerk, and the next section had been commenced and was nearly half through before he made the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana claims, however, that he could not hear the reading by the Clerk. The Chair will endeavor to get order upon the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend will observe that this is simply an increase of the salary by transposing this consul from the third to the fourth class. Now, I tried to keep up with the run of this particular bill with a view of calling attention to such paragraphs as I have marked, but in the confusion I was unable to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks, in view of the fact that there was some confusion on the floor, that the gentleman from Indiana should be allowed to make the point of order now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that this is new legislation and works an increase of the salary of $500.

Mr. BURNES. I have no desire to argue the proposition except to call attention to the point of order I have submitted. We had passed through the third class of consuls; the clerk had read the beginning of the fourth class, and had read the names of three or four different consulates without objection on the part of anybody that there was confusion on the floor and without any suggestion on the part of the Chair that there was any disorder in the committee. We had progressed to a new order of consulates, and the clerk had read three or four different names marking a distinct difference between the two grades. After he had commenced this reading my friend from Indiana rose in his seat and made a point of order on something that has been already passed over by the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. In answer to the gentleman from Missouri I will simply say that I was watching the reading of this bill with a view to this item and several others which I have marked, but I did not catch the reading of the provision owing to the confusion.

The CHAIRMAN. In view of the fact stated by the gentleman from Indiana the Chair will entertain the point of order.

The Chair will hold, in view of the statement that this is new legislation and increases the salary, that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. If I can get the ear of the gentleman from Missouri I will move that the words stricken out, "Belgium" and "Antwerp," be added immediately after the clause last read by the Clerk.

Mr. RANDALL. That will come in afterward at another point.

Mr. HOLMAN. It can come in here.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a proper place for Antwerp to come in further on in the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well. I shall not insist.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

VENEZUELA.

Maricaibo.

Mr. HOLMAN. The same point of order applies there; this being a transfer from the fifth class to the fourth.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The paragraph will be stricken out.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

SPANISH DOMINIONS.

Cienfuegos; Santiago de Cuba; Sagua la Grande (Cuba).

Mr. HOLMAN. Sagua la Grande is transferred from the fifth class to the fourth, making an increase of salary of $500. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

BELGIUM.

Brussels.

Mr. HOLMAN. Antwerp, stricken out from the third class, should be inserted here under the fourth class.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, "Antwerp" will be inserted at this point.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

TURKISH DOMINIONS.

Smyrna; Beirut.

Mr. HOLMAN. Beirut is transferred from the fifth class to the fourth, with an increase of salary of $500. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

The Clerk read the following paragraph under Class V, consuls at $2,000 per annum:

SWITZERLAND.

Basle; Zurich; Horgen.

Mr. HOLMAN. Horgen is a new consulate. It is not in the last law. I make the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. I desire to be indulged a moment while I make this remark: If the rules are to be construed and enforced, as it seems they are, then how can we ever get a consul at Horgen or any other place, however meritorious? The rule it seems would prevent us from establishing any new consulate.

This is now a feed consulate. It is a very important one. The records of the consulate show that it is a valuable one; that it is one not only in the very line of commerce, but that its promotion to a salaried consulate is in the line of economy. As a feed consul, the record shows that the consul received $2,780 of fees for 1883, and $3,360 for 1884. Under the statute he is entitled to retain $2,500 of those fees and the balance is paid over into the Treasury. The law requires him to report all his fees, and the report shows there is a gradually increasing business there. Instead of his receiving $2,500 salary out of $3,300 fees we place him in the fourth class at $2,000. If that is not in the line of economy, I ask what would be in the line of economy?

Does the gentleman from Indiana desire that this consul shall continue to receive $2,500, not as a salaried consul but as a feed consul? Or does he desire to retrench, to be economical, and to reduce the salary to $2,000? He is really getting $2,800, counting all the fees. I suggest, therefore, if my friend from Indiana is in the spirit of economy this evening he should withdraw his point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall have to insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read under Class VI, consuls at $1,500 per annum, the following:

GREAT BRITAIN.

Bristol; Newcastle; Auckland; Gibraltar; Cape Town; Saint Helena; Charlottetown (Prince Edward Island); Port Stanley; Clifton; Pictou; Winnipeg; Mahe; Kingston; Prescott; Port Sarnia; Quebec; Saint John's (Canada); Barbadoes; Bermuda; Fort Erie; Goderich (Canada West); Amherstburg (Canada West); Windsor (Canada West); Southampton; Ceylon; Antigua; Saint Stephen's; Malta.

Mr. HITT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "Port Stanley," line 249, add the words "(Falkland Islands)."

Mr. HITT. There are two consulates of that name, one in Ontario, in the Dominion of Canada, and the other in the Falkland Islands, off the coast of South America.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

BELGIUM.

Verviers and Liege; Ghent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order on "Ghent," which is transposed from Class VII to Class VI, with an increase of $500.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read, under Class VII, consuls at $1,000 per annum, the following:

GERMANY.

Stettin.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that by consent there be inserted at this point the words "Belgium: Ghent," that consulate having been taken on the point of order out of Class VI. It should now be inserted in Class VII. I think the gentleman in charge of the bill will concur in this suggestion.

There being no objection, the words indicated were inserted.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For allowance for clerks at consulates, $47,840; as follows:

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 329 insert:
"For salary of a clerk to the legation in Spain, $1,200."

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist on the point of order that this is new legislation.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Indiana at this time is counting without his host. This appropriation was made in the bill of last year, and the reason it was omitted from the present bill is this: When we were preparing this bill in the subcommittee we had created a consul-general at Madrid and had discontinued the appropriation for the clerk at that legation, supposing the consul-general would be of sufficient assistance to the minister there to render it unnecessary to employ a clerk.

In the debate last Saturday my colleague on the committee [Mr. WASHBURN] and myself supposed that the salary of the assistant secretary of legation had also been increased, which might have been a reason for not making this appropriation; but we were not correct in that supposition. No increase whatever has been made in the salary of the assistant secretary; and the provision for consul-general has been omitted from the bill upon a point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana. Now, all I desire to do is to restore the clerk which this minister has had under the bill of the current year, and, so far as I know, for a number of years.

I am informed that this clerk is very necessary for the convenient dispatch of business at the legation. It is necessary to have the assistance of a man who can write as well as speak Spanish. Ordinarily the legation has employed as clerk a Spaniard able to speak and write the language. The amendment proposes to give the legation nothing more than it has had under the bill of the current year. The point of order is not good, for the reason that a similar appropriation was made last year and has been made perhaps for many years. It has been omitted from the present bill only because of the facts I have stated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not find this appropriation in the bill providing for the present fiscal year, but I am willing to take the statement of my friend from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman will find it on the first page of the bill of last year, under the clause appropriating salaries of secretaries of legation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon the statement of the gentleman I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that the amendment be inserted after line 327.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have no objection to modifying my amendment in that way.

The CHAIRMAN (having put the question on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. TOWNSHEND). In the opinion of the Chair the amendment is adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not insist upon a division, though I do not believe this clerk to be necessary.

So the amendment of Mr. TOWNSHEND was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For an additional allowance for clerks at consulates, to be expended at the above-named places in the discretion of the Secretary of State, $4,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that the paragraph just read is new legislation, and not in the interest of economy. I am willing to withdraw the point if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] can show any necessity for the provision.

Mr. BURNES. I call upon my friend the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] to bear testimony to the fact that I am as reasonably economical as I think anybody ought to be.

Mr. RANDALL. I have only made the point of order so that the gentleman may show, if he can, the necessity for the provision.

Mr. BURNES. I am advised by a great many gentlemen that the allowances under the head of clerk-hire are very scant; hence this general provision recommended by the State Department is believed to be but a proper supplement to the reduction of clerk-hire.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the appropriation in this paragraph exceed the aggregate amount of the reduction to which the gentleman alludes?

Mr. BURNES. My impression is that this is about $3,200 more than the current law allows for clerk-hire all told.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on the point of order?

Mr. RANDALL. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. RANDALL. That this is new legislation, and not in the interest of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri concede that this provision is not in the present law?

Mr. BURNES. I concede that this particular provision is not; but the point of order would certainly not lie as to more than $3,200; and, indeed, I do not see that the point of order would lie at all.

The CHAIRMAN. If this appropriation exceeds the amount allowed by the present law the whole paragraph must go out; but an amendment can afterward be moved to insert the amount authorized by law.

Mr. BURNES. My impression is there is a general provision authorizing clerical assistance to consulates; but I have not been able to find it. I will, however, call the attention of the Chair to the fact that a thousand years from now, when we may have a thousand millions of people, we can not, if the present doctrine is to prevail, add a single clerk to our list.

Mr. RANDALL. If there is any clerk necessary at any particular point let such a provision be put in the bill; but I am opposed to giving this general allowance of $4,000, leaving its expenditure to the discretion of the Department. I have not been able to find any law authorizing this allowance. If the gentleman from Missouri will show me the law I will yield the point, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order unless the law can be produced.

Mr. BURNES. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point.

The Clerk read as follows:

To meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act, to be expended under direction of the President, pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the question of order against that paragraph.

Mr. BURNES. I am opposed to this provision of the bill, but I will not make the question of order against it. It is the old question we argued at the last session of Congress as to whether or not the President should have a fund which he should expend without accounting for it to the people. I am opposed to the provision.

Mr. RANDALL. The point of order has been made against it by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. I rose in time and made the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. I do not think the point of order lies against it, as it is provided for by section 291 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. That provision is sought to be put onto this bill in pursuance of the following statute, to which I wish to ask the attention of the Chair. It is section 291 of the Revised Statutes. I submit that section of the statutes referred to by this paragraph is not a law providing for a public expenditure. It does not provide for a public service requiring the expenditure of money. It is a mere method of accounting in the event appropriation is made, as the Chair will see when the section is read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 291. Whenever any sum of money has been or shall be issued, from the Treasury, for the purposes of intercourse or treaty with foreign nations, in pursuance of any law, the President is authorized to cause the same to be duly settled annually with the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, by causing the same to be accounted for, specifically, if the expenditure may, in his judgment, be made public; and by making or causing the Secretary of State to make a certificate of the amount of such expenditure as he may think it advisable not to specify; and every such certificate shall be deemed a sufficient voucher for the sum therein expressed to have been expended.

Mr. HOLMAN. The first portion is the portion which controls this question of order, which I will proceed to state. The substance of that is, that where, in pursuance of a law, a sum of money shall be withdrawn from the Treasury; where, in pursuance of law—I do not quote the language but merely refer to the substance of it—that where a sum of money shall be drawn from the Treasury it shall be accounted for in a certain manner. It does not provide for a public service requiring an appropriation of money, but simply that if an appropriation shall be made according to law or made by the law, then it determines the manner in which the account shall be made. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CANNON. I wish to be heard for a moment on the point of order. The gentleman from Indiana has had read section 291 of the Revised Statutes. But this appropriation is not made under that section at all. When expended the account is to be settled in the way there indicated.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is not under that section, then I hope the gentleman will furnish the law under which this does come.

Mr. CANNON. I will satisfy the gentleman on that point I think. This fund is to meet the execution of the neutrality act, and is to be expended under the direction of the President pursuant to the mode prescribed in section 291.

Mr. HOLMAN. Where is the law providing for the appropriation of money to enforce the neutrality act?

Mr. CANNON. The neutrality act, passed in the first place in 1818, has been in force ever since in precisely the way here provided. It has been appropriated for almost every year since its enactment.

Mr. RANDALL. There is none for the current year.

Mr. CANNON. I claim it makes no difference whether it is there or not.

Mr. RANDALL. It does, according to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CANNON. The Chair will decide after he has heard my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Now, if the Chair will turn to section 5281 of the Revised Statutes, on page 1001, he will find the neutrality act. It covers sections 5281 to 5291. One section gives the President power to prohibit military expeditions against people with whom the United States is at peace. Another gives power to compel foreign vessels to depart from our ports in certain cases. It provides for armed vessels giving bonds under certain circumstances. There are various other matters referred to in that neutrality act which I need not mention at this time. Now, this fund is given to the President of the United States for the purpose of enforcing the neutrality act. The accounts are to be settled in pursuance of the mode prescribed in section 291. In other words, Mr. Chairman, this is a confidential fund which has always been given to the President of the United States, and is settled and adjusted on his certificate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that the neutrality act, like all other acts, does not execute itself. It is to be executed, and the question is simply presented whether an appropriation of a specific sum of money for the execution of that law is an appropriation of money in conformity with law. The general theory that we have indulged in, I think, is where the law has provided for expenditure, as, for instance, has provided a salary, provided an expenditure in connection with foreign ministers or any other branch of the public service—that where the law has provided for an expenditure, then that expenditure of money is in conformity with law.

But here the law is shown (the neutrality act), and stands on the same footing as any of the body of the laws which, under the Constitution, the President shall take care to be faithfully executed, using the language of the Constitution. Nor can you support the proposition that an appropriation of money is proper upon the simple basis that here is a legal enactment which, in common with all the other laws of the land, is to be enforced. The object of specific appropriations for the enforcement of law is to provide for the meeting of the current expenses of the channels or agencies through which the laws are to be enforced. But here is a general statute, embracing many provisions, imposing certain duties upon the Executive of the Government. Does the fact that these powers are conferred upon the President by the provisions of the Constitution or the law authorize the appropriation of this money? That is the question.

Mr. RANDALL. And in addition to that I make the point that it is not in the existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; there is no such provision in the present law nor in the present appropriation bill. I submit that law stands upon the same footing as any other law, and the specific sum of money for its enforcement is not an appropriation in conformity with such law. That is to say, there is no law requiring the appropriation of money for this purpose.

All the powers of the Government are used in support of the laws of the land, whether it be the appropriations for the support of the Army or the appropriations for the support of the Navy, and such appropriations are for the purpose of carrying into effect the body of the laws of the land and securing their enforcement. But here is a specific, definite appropriation of money for the purpose of carrying out a particular provision of law. If that principle prevails the Chair will perceive that there is no limit to the power of appropriation, because every appropriation of money you can mention affects the carrying into execution of some existing law. If there are exceptions, the general rule would be that they are merely for the purpose of carrying into effect some general or specific law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard further?

Mr. CANNON. Only to call the attention of the Chair again to the fact that here is a public law that has rested upon the statute-books for half a century and that appropriations have been made all that time for the enforcement of it. Now, if it is possible for any appropriation to be in order in pursuance of existing law I suppose this would be.

It may be that the gentleman from Indiana knows some provision of law, or knows some way that the law will enforce itself. If so, I am only sorry that we have not had the benefit of his information throughout the general run of these appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, here is a power imposed upon the President of the United States. The Constitution itself provides that he shall take care the laws are faithfully executed; and I apprehend that that constitutional provision refers to this as well as to the other laws or the same terms and conditions. But I submit under this general power, meaning the power to see that the laws are faithfully executed, if you can appropriate money for the execution of each specific law there is no limit to the extent of the appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that the limitations imposed by the rules of the House themselves require specific existing law pointing out the way in which money shall be expended. The neutrality act is general in its provisions, and hence the Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. CANNON. I shall be compelled, Mr. Chairman, to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the appeal of the gentleman and will recognize him if he desires to be heard.

Mr. CANNON. Now, sir, I take this appeal for the purpose of saying that it occurs to me the chairman has given a construction of this rule not contemplated by the rules of the House. The rules are strict enough in themselves without receiving a construction by the Chair that would prohibit in a large majority of cases the making of an appropriation at all.

But, Mr. Chairman, pending this appeal, it being a matter of very considerable importance, I will be glad if the committee will rise; and therefore, if no other gentleman will do so, I will make the motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope that will not be done. I am under a sort of partial obligation to the gentleman from Virginia who has charge of the Judiciary Committee to make every proper effort to get rid of this bill to-day, so that the committee may have all to-morrow for the consideration of its bills.

A MEMBER. Then let us take a vote on the appeal at once.

Mr. CANNON. It is now five minutes to 5 o'clock. I am entitled to the floor. I have the floor upon an appeal.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, let the gentleman go on. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CANNON. If gentlemen will make less noise around me I will make much better progress.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the gentleman go on.

Mr. CANNON. I will proceed under the rules of this House by the recognition of the Chair, and not by direction of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not mean to direct the gentleman at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has the floor.

Mr. CANNON. I will state again, I believe this question is of sufficient importance, the usual hour of adjournment being already upon us, that the committee should rise, so that we may see what the point of order is and the decision of the Chair in to-morrow morning's RECORD, and if some gentleman will make the motion that the committee rise, I shall be glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. BURNES. I would like to accommodate my colleague on the committee, but I must dispose of this bill to-night if I can have my will.

Mr. CANNON. I will take the sense of the committee upon it anyhow. I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 17, noes 60.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN (putting the question). As many as are of opinion that the decision of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the committee will say "ay."

Mr. CANNON. I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. CANNON. I have not yielded the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. When the gentleman from Illinois made another motion he yielded the floor.

Mr. CANNON. I beg the Chair's pardon; I did not yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. CANNON. I did appeal from the decision of the Chair and had the floor, and in my own time I made the motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the gentleman from Illinois, having appealed from the decision of the Chair, yielded the floor upon that appeal for another motion.

Mr. CANNON. I beg the Chair's pardon; nobody made the motion but myself.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the reason why the gentleman lost the floor. He yielded it when he made his motion.

Mr. CANNON. But I made the motion that the committee rise. I do not understand that that took me off my feet. I distinctly stated in my remarks that I expected to occupy the time to which I was entitled; but while I was occupying my time, and was entitled to the floor, I made that motion, stating I wanted to take the sense of the committee on the question of the committee rising.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair never knew the sense of the committee or the sense of the House to be taken by a gentleman entitled to the floor during his hour. Can the gentleman point the Chair to a precedent?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes. The Chair asks if I can point to a precedent. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. CANNON. If gentlemen will possess their souls in patience I will reply to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has not the floor at present. The Chair will again put the question: As many as are of opinion that the decision of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the committee will say "ay."

Mr. CANNON. I want to discuss that question.

The CHAIRMAN, having completed putting the question, stated that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. CANNON. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 66, no 1.

Mr. CANNON. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers; and appoints the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANDALL.

Mr. CANNON. Pending that, I move the committee do now rise.

The question being taken, the Chair stated that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. CANNON. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 0, noes 47.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee refuses to rise.

The Clerk began to read the next paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. Is it in order for the Clerk to proceed to read? The Chair made a ruling. The judgment of the Chair not agreeing with mine, I appealed from the decision of the Chair, made, I think, improperly and by mistake. I was taken off my feet. Then upon the vote I called for a division, and as I understand tellers were ordered, and the vote by tellers should now proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is right. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANDALL, will take their places as tellers. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

After the count by tellers had proceeded for some time,

Mr. CANNON said: As one of the tellers I make my report. There seems no one else coming forward to vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers report—ayes 99, noes 3.

Mr. RANDALL (one of the tellers). One more has just voted in the affirmative. That gives an even hundred.

Mr. CANNON. I make the point that a quorum has not voted.

Mr. HAMMOND. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the calling of the roll when the committee finds itself without a quorum.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following members failed to answer:

The roll-call being concluded, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, had found itself without a quorum; whereupon the chairman, in accordance with the rule, had directed the roll to be called, and now reported the names of the absentees to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. It was not announced in the Committee of the Whole how many members had answered to their names. Perhaps that may be stated now as a matter of information.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the names of the absentees, after which the Chair will announce the number of members present upon the roll-call.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order at the present time; the list of absentees, as reported by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, has not yet been read to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I am advised that we are within a small number of having a quorum.

Mr. BAYNE. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. There is no call of the House. The rule requires that when the Committee of the Whole finds itself without a quorum the names of the absentees shall be reported to the House. That report, as submitted by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, will now be read.

The Clerk read the names of the absentees as already stated.

The SPEAKER. From the report of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union it appears that one hundred and fifty-six members (not including the Speaker) have answered to their names, being less than a quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. I move a call of the House. This seems to be a question between public duty and dinner. [Laughter.]

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was not agreed to.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

A bill (H. R. 5322) for the benefit of William H. Wheeler.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 5249) to provide a criminal code for the District of Columbia; and
A bill (H. R. 5650) for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves.

The bill (H. R. 3593) for the erection of a public building at Chicago, Ill., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (H. R. 2268) for the relief of John F. Severance was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PROTECTION OF CHILDREN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 729) for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which were in line 20, page 1, to strike out the words "within their view" and insert the words "in their presence;" and in line 27, page 2, to strike out "twenty-one" and insert "sixteen."

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to have the bill lie on the table until I can examine the amendments made to it by the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be laid upon the table.

ELIZABETH CARSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 12) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson; which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be investigated by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army the claim of Elizabeth Carson, of Bourbon County, State of Kentucky, for subsistence, use of jail, fuel, fire, care, and attention alleged to have been furnished by her to conscripts, deserters, and rebel prisoners confined in the jail of Bourbon County, Kentucky, by the military authorities of the United States, in the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865; such investigation to extend to the status of the claimant, whether loyal or not, the value of the supplies furnished, the actual rental value of the property for the time it was occupied and used by United States authorities, the circumstances of the use of the jail and by whose authority or direction it was so used, and the reasons for the neglect to file her claim in the War Department; and when such investigation shall be completed the Secretary of War shall report the result thereof, with his recommendation thereon, to Congress, for its action in the premises.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] reported this bill to the Senate from the Committe on Claims.

Mr. MANDERSON. As a member of the Committee on Claims I reported the bill for which this is a substitute. I move that the bill and amendment be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

FISH IN POTOMAC RIVER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a House bill which was passed by the Senate and sent to the House of Representatives with an amendment. The House returns the bill with a message which will be read with the title of the bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 12, 1885.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3108) to protect fish in the Potomac River in the District of Columbia, and to provide a spawning-ground for shad and herring in the said Potomac River, and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. J. S. BARBOUR of Virginia, Mr. J. T. SPRIGGS of New York, and Mr. L. E. MCCOMAS of Maryland be the managers of the said conference on the part of the House.

Mr. LAPHAM. The amendment of the Senate to the House bill was a provision simply preventing the gas companies of the District from depositing their refuse in the waters of the Potomac. It was recommended to us by Professor Baird, who informed us that he had seen the officers of the gas companies and that they assented to the propriety of such legislation. Professor Baird said that without that provision the original bill would be useless for the purposes for which it was designed. I move, therefore, that the Senate concur in the request of the House for a conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate insist upon its amendment to the bill, and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. LAPHAM, SEWELL, and GROOME were appointed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7895) for the regulation of the practice of dentistry in the District of Columbia, and for the protection of the people of said District from empiricism in relation thereto; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of G. W. Alexander and 200 other citizens of Iowa, praying for the passage of an act of Congress for the resumption of certain lands within the limits of the grant to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company, and that settlers on said lands be protected in their rights; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a memorial of the Cigar-makers' Union of La Crosse, Wis., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MITCHELL presented memorials of the cigar-makers' unions of Erie, Bradford, and Pittsburgh, Pa., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7874) making additional appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, to report it with sundry amendments. I ask that the bill be printed with the proposed amendments, and I give notice that I shall call it up to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INGALLS in the chair). The bill will be so printed and placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 884) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund money wrongfully paid for duties on imports by Daniel Marcy, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 656) for the benefit of the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada (and Nevada when a Territory), reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and moved their indefinite postponement; which was agreed to:

A bill (S. 77) for the disposal of the public lands; and

A bill (S. 426) to amend the homestead laws.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1571) granting a pension to James McCallen, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Kate Morgan Smith, widow of Edward W. Smith, late major of the Twenty-second United States Infantry, of Buffalo, N. Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 760) for extension of pension of Mrs. Ann Leddy, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JACKSON. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 362) granting a pension to Abraham H. Burkholder, to report it adversely.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is the bill reported adversely because the case is pending in the Pension Office?

Mr. JACKSON. It is reported adversely because the pension has been granted. He asks for arrears, and the committee do not propose to grant arrears.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should have withdrawn the bill if I had thought the committee was going to act upon it so soon. I was aware of the fact that he had not applied and presented his papers to the Pension Office, and so advised him, and he then applied to the Pension Office.

Mr. JACKSON. The pension has been allowed since the presentation of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the report will be agreed to and the bill postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAWLEY. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 78) to provide for the retirement of Col. Henry J. Hunt as a major-general in the United States Army. With the consent of the Senate I shall file a written report within a brief time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, and the report will be filed hereafter.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5960) granting a pension to George Ziefle, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 99) directing copies of the official letter-books of the executive department of the State of North Carolina to be furnished to said State, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted a report to accompany the bill (S. 2495) for the relief of John Hollins McBlair, reported by him from the Committee on Military Affairs on the 6th of January, 1885.

REPORT ON LABOR IN EUROPE.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably a concurrent resolution providing for printing the letter of the Secretary of State of December 12, 1884, and the accompanying reports of United States consuls on labor in Europe. I ask consent to state that this concurrent resolution has received the cordial approval of the Committee on Foreign Relations; the printing is strongly urged by the State Department, and it seems to the Committee on Printing that the document should be printed. I ask on behalf of that committee that the resolution be now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks that the resolution be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the letter of the Secretary of State dated December 12, 1884, and the accompanying reports of United States consuls on labor in Europe, be printed, and that 1,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives; and for the use of the Department of State, 5,000 copies, and 10,000 copies of the Secretary's letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know of the Senator from Nebraska why the committee provide for printing a larger number of the letter of the Secretary of State than of the consuls' reports.

Mr. MANDERSON. The letter of the Secretary of State, I understand, contains a synopsis or digest of these consular reports, and it seemed important to the committee that it should be printed as a separate document, the printing of the letter being quite inexpensive.

Mr. COCKRELL. By the resolution there is allotted to the Senate only 1,000 copies and 2,000 copies to the House of the letter of the Secretary of State and the reports of the consuls printed together. It seems to me that the Senate and House should be furnished with some copies at least of the letter of the Secretary of State printed separately. We have a large number of applications for that class of publications, and the number, 1,000, allowed the Senate, which would be only about twelve apiece, would amount to very little. I think the number allowed to the Senate is too small.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it lie on the table for a while. I shall object to its consideration until I can have time to examine it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie on the table.

LUCY LE G. JEFFERS.

Mr. CULLOM. I report favorably from the Committee on Pensions the bill (H. R. 3661) granting an increase of pension to Lucy Le G. Jeffers. I should like to make a statement, and then ask the Senate to consider the bill. The Senate during the last session passed a bill similar to the one which I have now reported and it went to the House. The House during the same session passed this bill just like it, and it came here. I ask now that the Senate consider the House bill, which is a precise copy of the one heretofore passed by the Senate, so that I may then ask the House to return the bill of the Senate which the Senate heretofore passed, and there may not be two bills passed on the same subject. I ask for the immediate consideration of the House bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to increase the pension of Lucy Le G. Jeffers, widow of the late Commodore William N. Jeffers, United States Navy, from $25 to $50 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate request the House to return to the Senate the bill (S. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Lucy Le G. Jeffers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, if there is no objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GARLAND introduced a bill (S. 2531) granting an increase of pension to Sophia Brooke Taylor; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2532) granting an increase of pension to Prudence Bond; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2533) granting a pension to Jesse Stewart; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SABIN introduced a bill (S. 2534) to grant the right of way to the Pierre and Southeastern Railroad Company across the Old Winnebago Indian reservation in Dakota Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2535) granting a pension to Mrs. Julia Hartley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 2536) to provide for the erection of a public building at Madison, Ind.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 2537) making railroad corporations organized by acts of Congress subject to the control of legislation of the States and Territories in which such roads may be constructed; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. PALMER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2538) granting a pension to George T. Lloyd, late of Company I, Fortieth Massachusetts Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SLATER introduced a bill (S. 2539) to create a new land district in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RETIRED GENERAL OF THE ARMY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer a bill, which I ask may be read at length the first time.

The bill (S. 2530) to authorize an additional appointment on the retired-list of the Army was read the first time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint on the retired-list of the Army of the United States, from among those who have been generals commanding the armies of the United States, or generals-in-chief of said Army, one person, and the total number now allowed by law to compose said retired-list shall be, on such appointment, increased accordingly.

The bill was read the second time by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now considered. Every Senator will see the object and purpose and application of the bill. It will authorize the President of the United States to appoint Ulysses S. Grant on the retired-list of the Army, and in its form it obviates the difficulty which we have observed in an executive message on another question in respect to such matters. It is in such a shape that the President of the United States may appoint General Grant, or he may appoint General McClellan; I do not remember whether there are any others, but I think there are some others who would fall within it. It gets rid of the constitutional difficulty which the President had with the Fitz-John Porter bill, and enables the United States to pay this act of gratitude and justice to General Grant. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the second time, the Senator from Vermont asks that the bill may be further considered at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the bill be printed and laid on the table until we can read it. I do not think it is fair or just to ask this body to pass a bill simply upon one reading. I think we are entitled to the courtesy of having an opportunity to read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will go over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that it be printed and placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be printed and placed on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I give notice that to-morrow morning I shall ask the Senate to consider it.

DISTILLED SPIRITS FOR EXPORTATION.

Mr. PLATT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to communicate to the Senate copies of all orders, regulations, decisions, and correspondence made or approved by him since the 20th of December, 1884, relating to the collection, postponement, or remission of the tax upon distilled spirits intended to be exported.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. MILLER, of California, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 500 copies of each of the following documents, the same to be included in one document, namely:

1. Senate Executive Document No. 112, Forty-sixth Congress, second session.
2. Senate Executive Document No. 194, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.
3. Senate Executive Document No. 26, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.

PUBLIC POLICY OF CONFEDERATE STATES EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution I had the honor to offer on the 8th of January calling upon the President to communicate a certain report by General Sherman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the resolution which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if in his opinion it be not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate a historical statement concerning the public policy of the executive department of the Confederate States during the late war of the rebellion, reported to have been lately filed in the War Department by General William T. Sherman.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do this, Mr. President, because——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate on this motion is not in order under the rule. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. CONGER. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is a motion made this morning to take up the resolution. The yeas and nays were ordered on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. VANCE. Do I understand the Chair to announce that debate is not in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution debate is not in order. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is before the Senate. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution, on which question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, as the Senate will probably pass this resolution and place upon its records an unofficial paper, filed in the War Department by General W. T. Sherman, which contains statements affecting certain persons, it is but right and proper that all persons so affected should be heard in the same forum. As one thus interested, I desire to notice some statements made in that communication to the War Department. In order that I may not be misinterpreted I have placed in writing the material portions of what I desire to say, which shall be very brief.

It is understood and, I believe, not denied that in a speech made not long since in Saint Louis, Mo., General Sherman said he had seen a letter written by Mr. Jefferson Davis to a governor of a Southern State during the war, now a Senator, in which Mr. Davis threatened the coercion of any Southern State that should attempt to secede from the confederacy. As there are, I believe, three Senators at least on this floor who were governors of Southern States during the war, myself being one, I immediately on the appearance of that statement denied through the Post of this city that any such letter had ever been received by me. The newspapers soon afterward stated that General Sherman had been interviewed as to my denial, and had stated that he had not alluded to me as the person to whom the alleged letter had been addressed. I very naturally thought that this denial at both ends of the line had concluded the matter so far as I was concerned; but it seems not. In the statement filed in the War Department, as published in the papers of the country, I find the following assertion:

At Raleigh, though the mass of the public records had been carried off, yet a number were left behind at the state-house and at the governor's mansion, called the "palace," which we occupied as headquarters during our stay there, namely, from April 13 to April 29, 1865.

These records and papers were overhauled by provost-marshals and clerks, who delivered to Adjutant-General Sawyer such as contained material information, and my personal attention was only drawn to such as were deemed of sufficient importance. Among the books collected at the palace in Raleigh was a clerk's or secretary's "copy-book," containing loose sheets and letters, among which was the particular letter of Mr. Davis to which I referred in my Saint Louis "speech." I gave it little attention at the time, because Mr. Davis was then himself a fugitive, and his opinions had little or no importance, but it explained to my mind why Governor Vance, after sending to me commissioners to treat for his State separately, had not awaited my answer. It was the subject of common talk about my headquarters at the time, or, as stated by Colonel Dayton in a recent letter to me from Cincinnati, "I am quite sure that we generally talked [that] it was the desire of Governor Vance and the State officials to take North Carolina out of the confederacy, as I have stated, but they were afraid of Jefferson Davis and wanted protection."

Concerning this I have the following observations to make:

1. That no letters or documents of a public character were ever left at my residence in the governor's mansion, while I was governor, at any time.

2. No clerk or secretary of mine ever used as a repository for my correspondence a "copy-book;" all official or public letters being first copied in the letter-book required by law to be kept in the executive office, and then bound into bundles and placed in the files, where they remain to this day.

3. General Sherman did not find in that copy-book "the particular letter of Mr. Davis to which he referred in his Saint Louis speech," for the simple reason that there was no such letter there.

4. I aver most positively, on the honor of a gentleman and an American Senator, that no letter containing such a threat was ever received by me from Mr. Jefferson Davis. All letters from him to me of any nature are to be found copied in the letter-books of the executive department of North Carolina, now in the War Department in this city.

The reasons given by General Sherman by way of corroborating his statement are such as would scarcely be relied upon by a respectable lawyer. He says he paid "little attention to it at the time," and does not say that he ever saw it afterward; and further, that Mr. Davis was then himself a fugitive, and his opinions had little or no importance! It was, perhaps, the little attention given to the opinions of an unimportant man that enabled him to remember so well the contents of the letter in which they were expressed after the lapse of nearly twenty years! The suggestion as to the probable fate of that mysterious letter, that it was burned in the great fire in Chicago, is a mere apology for its nonproduction, which at the same time contradicts the idea of its importance; for had it been such as he says it was, it would certainly have found its way to the public files.

But there is another matter averred by General Sherman that more nearly concerns me, and to which I shall very briefly ask the attention of the Senate.

It may be that Northern gentlemen who were on the victorious side during the civil war can not properly appreciate the feelings and sentiments of those who were on the side of misfortune and defeat. They seem to regard it as quite a sin that we do not readily join in the denunciations of him who was our leader in the war, and hasten to condemn him on all occasions as the surest way of excusing our conduct and commending ourselves to the good opinion of our late opponents. Surely no man of even the slightest sense of honor could respect a Southern man who would thus debase himself. Surely the most flagrant and rampant trafficker in the issues of sectional hatred would prefer an adversary who walked upright on his feet to the one who crawled upon his belly. If not, what must be thought of his own manhood?

Now, sirs, be it known to you, that those of us who pledged our faith to each other for the establishment of the confederacy gave up all for which we contended when it failed, retaining to ourselves only one solitary satisfying reflection, and that was that we had at least served our country faithfully, honestly, and devotedly, as we understood it.

This satisfaction General Sherman's statement would to some extent take from me, and this it is, sir, which I resent. It is well known that I was drawn into secession unwillingly; it is also well known that in regard to many of the details of administration I was at variance with the authorities of the confederate government; but it is equally well known, I hope, that, after my own honor was engaged and the honor of my native State, there never was an hour during all that unhappy time in which I did not give every energy of my body, mind, and soul to the success of the cause to which I had pledged my allegiance. General Sherman, professing high respect for me, for which I thank him, thinks, perhaps, that he does me a kindness and commends me to the people of the country by holding out the idea that I was disaffected while Governor toward the cause for which I was ostensibly fighting, and that I was anxious to separate myself and State from the confederacy, but was restrained by fear. Sir, I want no man's respect or good-will based on the supposed virtues of treason to my country and the desertion of my associates. The good-will of a man who would respect these traits in another is not worth picking up from the dust of the common highways. General Sherman says that the commissioners whom I sent to meet him as he approached Raleigh, to wit, ex-Governor Swain and ex-Governor Graham and Surgeon-General Warren, told him that I wanted to make separate terms for the State, but was afraid of "Jeff Davis." I do not believe it. It can not be true. The two gentlemen first named are dead; they were eminent North Carolinians, of most exalted character in all respects, and most especially for truth. They knew I was faithful to the confederacy; they knew that I was not afraid of opposing Mr. Davis when I differed from him, because they had seen me constantly doing it, and they never told General Sherman or any other living man the contrary of what they knew to be true as perfectly as any men in North Carolina.

The other commissioner, Dr. Edward Warren, was surgeon-general of the State of North Carolina, is now living, and is an eminent physician in Paris. His statement would surely carry as much proof of what was said there as that of the witness cited to prove that there was talk about camp of "the desire of Governor Vance and other State officials to take North Carolina out of the confederacy, but they were afraid of Jeff. Davis and wanted protection." True it is that I sent a commission to him under a flag of truce to ask protection, not separate terms for the people of my State, but at that moment the war was virtually ended. Lee had surrendered, Richmond had fallen, President Davis and his official household were fugitives, and General Johnston, commanding the last remnant of an army devoted to the South, was about to march westward, no one knew whither, and uncover the capital of the State. With his consent and approbation that embassy was sent, and through his lines under his permit it went. Before its return Raleigh was uncovered and I had left to join Mr. Davis, at Charlotte, where the surrender of General Johnston was authorized and the finality of things brought about. Then and there I took my leave of Mr. Davis and of the confederacy, and went back with his full approbation to share the fate of my people.

General Sherman finds an explanation of my failure to await the return of my embassy in the contents of the mysterious letter—that I was afraid of Davis, then a fugitive without an army. Bold enough he says I was to send an embassy to the enemy, but I was afraid to await its return! Was ever conclusion more absurd? The reason why I did not wait was that I had been told my embassy after passing through the confederate lines had been captured by Kilpatrick's cavalry, promptly robbed of their personal effects, and taken before General Sherman as prisoners. Not returning up to midnight of the day on which they were sent, I concluded this to be true, and left with the retreating troops.

How well and how faithfully I served the lost cause the country knows. My own people, sir, about whose opinion I am most concerned, will wonder that anybody can be found to question it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, when I offered this resolution on the 8th instant I certainly did not anticipate a debate, surely not a lengthened debate upon it. It was a simple call for information. I decline to be drawn into the question as to whether there is here merely a personal quarrel between General Sherman and Mr. Davis. I say there is not. I say inquiry concerns important facts of history which throw light upon the great dispute concerning the theories of our Government.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] misapprehends the people who were on the side of the Union, I am sure, if he thinks that they expect those men who were associated in a mistaken struggle in favor of what I consider vicious theories of society and of government to turn now and rend each other. We expect of them the ordinary elements of manhood—that they shall stand by one another. They pledged their lives and their fortunes in that desperate struggle. No man expects one or another of them, in decency, honor, or fair play, to turn and villify his associates and throw blame on them, especially to seek favor by so doing. There is no such spirit in the North. On the other hand, those who won in that fight may be expected to assert and stand by precisely what they did win. They declared that secession was not known as a theory of government; they declared that the causes of secession were weak and unsatisfactory, existing chiefly in the imagination. So far as the system of slavery was at the bottom of it, they declared it was not worth support, it did not deserve the support of a democratic or a Christian people; they declared that the Union could not be dissolved by the voluntary secession of its members. All these things they made good on the battlefield. They are recorded in the legislation of the country. The characterization of that effort as a rebellion has gone into the Constitution of the country.

While I have no disposition to exult over those who lost, or to make their situation unnecessarily uncomfortable, whenever the question arises in any form or shape or by the provocation of whomsoever, I must stand absolutely by those principles as I did in the very heat of the war. I must vehemently assert their justice and stand ready to defend them at any moment. Those who were engaged upon the other side can expect nothing else. They can never ask us to speak of Jefferson Davis in public or political debate as anything but a conspirator and a traitor.

I did not seek this debate; I do not care to prolong it. I did hope this morning it would end with a simple vote on the resolution itself. If gentlemen desire—the provocation came from that side—if they really wish to obtain further debate, they know perfectly well of what character it must be. They can go back twenty or twenty-five years and find it in the records of Congress, and they will hear to-day the same vehement assertion of our belief on our side that they find recorded then.

I learned long ago to apply this rule to similar cases, to say that we must judge of men by the light they had and of measures by the light we have. The measure of disfavor or personal condemnation which shall be visited upon any man who was engaged in the confederacy is a matter outside of law and legislation; it is a matter for the favor of Heaven and the kind charity and consideration of his fellow-men as private citizens; but our judgment of their principles and measures is absolute, final, severe, crushing, as made good in the highest court to which mankind ever appealed.

There were certain political theories of great consequence advocated upon either side. Those who went out declared that a State had a right to secede under provocation of which it must be the judge. They asserted certain rights for what they called sovereign and independent States, which we denied to them. This chapter of history which we are now discussing goes to show that their avowed theories exhibited in a short time their inherent weakness; that they themselves found themselves unable to live by them in the attempt to maintain their own confederacy, and that Mr. Davis was disposed to resort to, intended resorting to, and did resort to substantial measures beyond any powers that were assumed by the United States Government in the attempt to preserve its life. None know this better than two distinguished members of this body upon whom I am now looking, who were governors of States in the confederacy during the war.

I know the history of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina. I know that his heart did not go with this war. I know that thirty or forty thousand majority of the people of North Carolina were opposed to the thought of secession up to a certain period when they supposed their hearts were fired by the proclamation of Abraham Lincoln. I know that war on the part of the confederacy could not have been carried on if it had not been for the support ultimately rendered by the Union men of North Carolina, among whom was that Senator. I venture to say that he knows also that, in the judgment of those Union men and of others who were not classed with them, Mr. Davis did go beyond his rightful powers as president of the confederacy under the confederate constitution; that he did abandon theories which they considered essential to a free government; that they rebuked him therefor, and that one of them at least told him absolutely and directly and positively, in a formal written communication, that he would not obey him. One of those governors absolutely refused to obey a command of Mr. Davis to turn over the State troops of Georgia to the confederacy, and used language which admits of no question or argument as to what he considered the political character of Mr. Davis and his character as an executive officer.

Now, not to embarrass the Senator from North Carolina—for I think after his statement he need not be embarrassed, and can not be by it—but in order to justify these statements concerning the political history of that wonderful struggle, I venture to read a part of a communication from Governor Vance of North Carolina to Mr. Davis, dated February 9, 1864, and a small portion of the response made by Mr. Davis. The governor of North Carolina said:

> I hear with deep regret that a bill is certainly expected to pass the congress suspending the writ of habeas corpus throughout the confederacy, and that certain arrests will immediately be made in North Carolina. Of course, if congress and your excellency be resolved upon this, as the only means of repressing disaffection in this State, it would be a mere waste of time for me to argue the matter. And yet I should not hold myself guiltless of the consequences which I fear will follow did I not add yet another word of expostulation to the many which I have already spoken. If the bill referred to, about which I can form no opinion until I see it, be strictly within the limits of the constitution, I imagine the people of this State will submit to it, so great is their regard for law. If it be adjudged, on the contrary, to be in violation of that instrument, and revolutionary in itself, it will be resisted.

That is the doctrine of secession substantially, for the State of North Carolina assumed the right to itself to judge of the constitutionality and propriety of a measure of its federal government and promised resistance. Governor Vance continued:

> Should it become a law soon, I earnestly advise you to be chary of exercising the powers with which it will invest you. Be content to try, at least for a while, the moral effect of holding this power over the heads of discontented men before shocking all worshipers of the common law throughout the world by hurling freemen into sheriffless dungeons for opinion's sake. I do not speak this factiously, or by way of a flourish, nor do I believe that, as an enlightened lawyer, and a Christian statesman, you could feel any pleasure in the performance of such an ungracious task. I am, on the contrary, convinced that you believe it to be the only way to secure North Carolina in the performance of her obligations to her confederates. The misfortune of this belief is yours; the shame will light upon those unworthy sons who have thus sought to stab their mother because she cast them off. If our citizens are left untouched by the arm of military violence I do not despair of an appeal to the reason and patriotism of the people at the ballot-box.

Upon the theories held by the Senator from North Carolina, I say that is a manly letter, but my point is that the theories of the secessionists were failing them in their hour of need. Mr. Davis responded at considerable length. I do not care to read his whole letter; I will read the concluding paragraph of it:

> In respect to your general recommendations touching the exercise of any extraordinary powers conferred on me by Congress, I can only say that they will be used, if at all, with a due regard to the rights of the citizen as well as to the public safety.
> Arbitrary measures are not more congenial to my nature than to the spirit of our institutions. But should the occasion unhappily arrive when the public safety demands their employment, I would be derelict in duty if I hesitated to use them to the extent required by the exigency.

Mr. Davis declares virtually that he will do whatever he thinks necessary to the salvation of the confederacy.

I might prolong this by extracts from other similar correspondence, including something from the then governor of Georgia somewhat more decided, because it was a distinct defiance and refusal to obey. These things certainly tend to justify General Sherman and General Sherman's remarks. But the document in question is not before us; there is no authorized copy before us. I have not compared them with the original, and I can not say whether the copies in the newspapers are correct or not. It seemed to Senators with whom I consulted eminently proper that we should call for this historical statement made by that distinguished and honorable and truthful gentleman and soldier, that it might be laid before us in authentic shape and given to the country thus.

There is a wide chapter of history that opens at this point, but I did not consider this resolution a proper opportunity to go into it. I mention a fact, however, in conclusion, which I think has never been brought to the attention of the country, certainly not as it might have been. Notwithstanding the secession by reason of the alleged tendency of the Federal Government to improperly interfere with slavery in the States, toward the close of the war the Southern confederacy itself sent an authorized messenger to the British Government offering to abandon wholly, to abolish forever, the system of slavery if it could be assured of English countenance and assistance. There is no question in the world of that.

What becomes, then, of their own theories, upon which they so fiercely denounced us and Mr. Lincoln and all who were concerned in emancipation, or in the maintenance of the Union, when we, waiting, waiting in violence to our moral sentiments, waiting with a certain tenderness toward some which was a cruelty to others, till near the close of that great controversy, only finally as a last resort and as a military measure abolished slavery, the wicked cause of all this awful evil and crime, when, finding themselves in an emergency, they offered to Great Britain the destruction, the entire abolition of the system of slavery? By what means it was to be abolished I do not know. They had not obtained the consent of their individual States; we are not informed that there had been legislation by the States in that direction. It must have been, I suppose, under the war power; but that the offer was made is beyond question. It came too late; it reached Great Britain too late. I do not know how history might have been written if it had gone there one or two or three years earlier; it is quite useless to speculate; but the proposition was made, action under it was declined, the confederacy failed, slavery was abolished, and for thousands of years to come, and so long as history is written, the world will rejoice, including among those who rejoice the descendants of those who engaged in that war upon the wrong side.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I have no disposition to reopen the correspondence that took place between the president of the Confederate States and the then governor of Georgia, on the questions of difference of opinion which existed between them. That record is made up; it has passed into history; and I am willing to stand upon my part of it. I will not therefore reopen it, nor will I discuss it in this presence. I think it proper, however, that I should make a short response to a part of the remarks made by the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] as the remarks made by him without some explanation do not put a proper construction upon my conduct at the time.

I never disobeyed any legal order that the president of the Confederate States had a right to make, if he had any right to order the governor of a State. In the case referred to by the Senator from Connecticut, the facts were these: The Confederate States statutes prescribed who should be subject to confederate military duty, and who might be called into the field by the president of the Confederate States. There had been a wide difference of opinion between him and me on the constitutionality of what was known as the conscript act. The male population of Georgia between certain ages had been ordered into the service under that act, as in the case of the other States. While I entertained certain views against the constitutionality of the act, I put no obstacles in the way of its execution by confederate officers in the State, nor did I do any act that could in any way cripple the military operations of the confederacy. But when General Sherman's army invaded Georgia, I then called into the field a class of old men and boys who were not subject to duty under the confederate statutes; including also the officers of the different counties of the State, such as sheriffs, clerks, ordinaries, and officers of that character. And I ordered the whole of them into service; permitting them to form themselves into companies and regiments, and elect their own officers. And as testified by General Johnston, under whose command they were first placed, and afterward by General Hood, who saw them under fire, they were a gallant and reliable body of soldiery. While they were in the trenches defending Atlanta, the secretary of war of the Confederate States made a requisition upon me to turn over those troops to the confederate government, a portion of them who lived below a certain line to report to the commander at Charleston, General Jones I believe at the time; and the others to report to General Hood at Atlanta.

By some mistake, as we must now suppose, the president of the Confederate States had not informed himself correctly as to the then status of those troops. While his order would have divided them and sent part of them out of my State when they were defending her growing young city in the trenches, I refused to turn over those troops and comply with that requisition, because the president of the Confederate States had no right to order into service any class of troops that the laws of the Confederate States did not make subject to military service. I held those troops as State troops for the exigency—men up to 55 and boys down to 16, both above and below the age prescribed by the statutes of the Confederate States. I stood upon that, and refused to turn them over, but kept them under the command of General Hood, who then commanded the confederate forces, and threw no obstacle whatever in the way of their use as part of the confederate army while he remained with his army in the State. I will state here that though they were furloughed after the operations at Atlanta, to go home and gather the crops, they were called back into the field, and as their supreme commander I surrendered them to General Wilson of the Federal cavalry after Lee and Johnston had surrendered.

I make this statement because I think it due to the truth of history in this connection, and to show that there had been a mistake made by the government of the confederacy in calling for a class of troops that the president, as I construed the law, had no right to call into service. But they were continued in the service during the operations at Atlanta, subject to my command, but in fact under the confederate general in command. And they did gallant service as State troops to the end of the war. That is the history of that transaction.

I have already stated that I differed with Mr. Davis very fundamentally and materially on several questions that came up during the war; I discussed those differences with him frankly and independently; but I threw no obstacle at any time in the way of any of the military operations of the confederacy. To show the position I took at that time, I will read two or three sentences from my message to the Legislature of Georgia in March, 1864. In that message I said:

When did Georgia embarrass the confederate government in any matter pertaining to the vigorous prosecution of the war? When did she fail to furnish more than her full quota of troops, when she was called upon as a State by the proper confederate authority? And when did her gallant sons ever quail before the enemy, or fail nobly to illustrate her character upon the battlefield?

She can not only repel the attacks of her enemies on the field of deadly conflict, but she can as proudly repel the assaults of those who, ready to bend the knee to power for position and patronage, set themselves up to criticise her conduct, and she can confidently challenge them to point to a single instance in which she has failed to fill a legal requisition for troops made upon her through the regular constitutional channel. To the very last requisition made she responded with over double the number required.

She stands ready at all times to do her whole duty to the cause, and to the confederacy; but while she does this, she will never cease to require that her constitutional rights be respected, and the liberties of her people preserved.

This is all I desire to say on the general subject. Before I take my seat, however, I wish to call attention to one statement in General Sherman's letter which I think does me injustice. I do not deny that the statement made is substantially true as far as it goes, but it does not state the whole truth. I have no doubt that the mistake was an inadvertence. I have no idea that General Sherman intended to do me an injustice, but he does I think do injustice by omitting a fact which it was important to state. In his letter, as I find it published in the New York Herald, he uses this language:

On the 15th of September, 1864, I telegraphed to General Halleck, in Washington: "Governor Brown has disbanded his militia to gather the corn and sorghum of the State. I have reason to believe he and Stephens want to visit me, and have sent them a hearty invitation." Two days after I received from President Lincoln this dispatch:

"I feel great interest in the subjects of your dispatch, mentioning corn and sorghum and the contemplated visit to you." On the same day I answered him direct, by telegram: "I will keep the department fully advised of all developments connected with the subjects in which you feel interested. Mr. Wright, former member of Congress from Rome, Ga., and Mr. King, of Marietta, are now going between Governor Brown and myself. I have said to them that some of the people of Georgia are engaged in rebellion, begun in error and perpetuated in pride; but that Georgia can now save herself from the devastations of war, preparing for her, only by withdrawing her quota of the confederate army and aiding me to expel Hood from the borders of the State; in which event, instead of devastating the land as we progress, I will keep our men to the high roads and commons, and pay for the corn and meat we need."

That would seem to imply that Mr. Stephens, now deceased, and myself had indicated some wish to have a personal conference with General Sherman with a view to separate State accommodation for Georgia. So far as I am concerned, and I know it is true as to Mr. Stephens, neither of us entertained any such purpose, nor would either of us have entertained any such proposition. We should have been very glad to have seen negotiations opened between the Federal Government and the confederate government, but neither of us was the authorized agent of the confederate government to negotiate for terms of peace, and therefore neither of us could indicate any such desire to General Sherman.

I never heard that General Sherman entertained any such view, or contemplated a mission, or the sending of an agent to either of us, until Mr. William King—for Judge Wright never came—came to Milledgeville, to the executive mansion, and told me that General Sherman had sent him to invite me to an interview in Atlanta, to invite me to visit his headquarters, with the assurance of safe conduct, &c. I asked him what was the purpose of the interview, and was informed that he desired to confer with reference to terms of peace so far as Georgia was concerned.

Mr. King presented no written communication from General Sherman, but simply said he had come as a messenger at the request of General Sherman. I at once replied that I had no power to negotiate for terms of peace. So far as Georgia was concerned, I claimed no such right for her, and that the trip to General Sherman's headquarters would be entirely useless, as I could conduct no negotiations with him. It was a conversation, as there was no written communication, as already stated; but I had notes of the interview taken, and that there might be no misapprehension (for I knew there would be excitement when it was heard that a messenger from General Sherman had visited me at Milledgeville) I at once published in the newspapers of the State my reply to Mr. King and the message which I sent to General Sherman.

I was not like a great many other persons who are still living and were very active and very faithful confederates; I was not an original Union man; I was a secessionist. I am aware that there are but few of the original panel now alive, but still I was a secessionist, and the movement was with my consent, and Georgia went into the compact with the other Confederate States with my consent, for I was her executive at the time and a citizen of the State. Therefore there was no state of the case under which I could permit her to negotiate in any manner that might carry with it even implied bad faith to the other confederates. I closed my message to General Sherman which I sent by Mr. King in this language:

Say to General Sherman that Georgia has entered into a confederation with her Southern sisters for the maintenance of the same sovereignty, of each, severally, which she claims for herself, and her public faith thus pledged shall never be violated by me. Come weal or come woe, the State of Georgia shall never, by my consent, withdraw from the confederation in dishonor. She will never make separate terms with the enemy which may free her territory from invasion and leave her confederates in the lurch.

That was the concluding part of my reply to General Sherman. The only complaint I make of this publication is that I think he should have stated that I did not entertain any such propositions. The inference from his letter might be that I was inviting it, and the communication does not tell what was the result.

I wished to make these statements that they might go along with the statements of General Sherman. As already said, I do not believe he desires to do me any injustice, and I certainly desire to do him none. This is all I care to remark on the subject at this time.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg pardon of the Senate for trespassing a short time longer, but these historical statements would not be quite complete without the addition of what I propose to read. I do not do this for the purpose of introducing or implying any personal reflection on the Senator from Georgia. I am simply talking about the action of the governor of Georgia during the confederacy, and the bearing that action had upon the question whether the executive government of the confederacy adhered to its doctrines of State rights.

The governor of Georgia received in 1864 an order from the war department of the confederacy dated August 30, 1864:

SIR: The condition of your State, subjected to formidable invasion and menaced with destructive raids in different directions by the enemy, requires the command of all the forces that can be summoned for defense. From recent official correspondence submitted to the department, it appears, on your statement, that you have organized 10,000 or more of the militia of your State, and I am instructed by the president to make requisition on you for that number, and such further force of militia, to repel invasion, as you may be able to organize for confederate service. Those within the limits of General Hood's department will report to him; those outside to the commandant of the department of South Carolina and Georgia.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES A. SEDDON,
Secretary of War.

His Excellency J. E. BROWN,
Governor of Georgia, Milledgeville, Ga.

The governor of Georgia, under date of September 12, 1864, responds at some length; I quote the paragraphs essential to my argument fairly here, I think. Reciting some of the preliminary facts, the governor of Georgia proceeds to say:

Another remarkable fact deserves attention. During the whole march of the enemy upon Atlanta, and for more than a month after it was closely invested and shelled by the enemy, it never seems to have occurred to the president to make requisition upon me for the militia of Georgia to aid in repelling this formidable invasion, or these "destructive raids," and it is only when he is informed that I have an organization of gallant, fearless men, ready to defend the State against usurpations of power, as well as invasions by the enemy, that he makes requisition upon me for this force and all others I can organize.

* * * * * * *

In making this requisition it is quite clear that it was no part of the president's purpose to get these brave men into service. They were there at the time, in the trenches, among those who were nearest to the enemy, where they never faltered in a single instance.

Again:

The president must have some other motive in making the requisition, and I think it not uncharitable under all the circumstances to conclude that the object was to grasp into his own hands the entire control of the whole reserve militia of the State.

* * * * * * *

If I am asked to trust the sound judgment and good faith of the president for their discharge and return to their homes at such times as their services are not indispensable in the military field, I can not forget the faith that was violated last fall to thousands of Georgians.

The constitution of the Confederate States authorizes the States, as well as the confederacy, to keep troops in time of war, when actually invaded, as Georgia now is. Her militia have been organized and called into active service, under her own laws, for her own defense; and I do not feel that I am authorized to destroy her military organization at the behest of the president, or to surrender to him the command of the troops organized and retained by her by virtue of her reserved power for her own defense, when greatly needed for that purpose, and which are her only remaining protection against the encroachments of centralized power. I therefore decline to comply with or fill this extraordinary requisition. While I refuse to gratify the president's ambition in this particular, and to surrender the last vestige of the sovereignty of the State by placing the remainder of her militia under his control for the war, I beg to assure you that I shall not hesitate to order them to the front, and they will not shun the thickest of the fight, when the enemy is to be met upon the soil of their beloved State.

And he called attention to the fact that Georgia had then fifty regiments in Virginia.

If, however, I should be informed that the president will send no re-enforcements, and make no further efforts to strengthen our defenses, I then demand that he permit all the sons of Georgia to return to their own State, and within her own limits to rally around her glorious flag, &c.

The confederate secretary of war, under date of October 8, 1864, responded somewhat at length. I make an extract. After summarizing Governor Brown's letter, Mr. Seddon said:

On analyzing your excellency's letter it is apparent that the prominent and influencing reasons of your action spring from a spirit of opposition to the government of the Confederate States and animosity to the chief magistrate whom the people of the confederacy have honored by their choice and confidence. Your reasons may be reduced to the following:

* * * * * * *

Fourth. That these troops, besides being necessary to a defense against invasion, are also necessary to defend the State against usurpation of power, and as "a protection against the encroachments of centralized power," and that the knowledge of the president's of their ability and disposition to do this was the motive for the call on you.

* * * * * * *

To your last reason I refrain from replying as its character would justify. I can not think the significancy of the language quoted has been duly appreciated by your excellency. I prefer to consider them as inconsiderate utterances rather than the foreshadowing of a guilty purpose to array your State in armed antagonism against the confederacy, and so to betray the cause of herself and sister States.

Governor Brown responded again at length, in the course of which response he said:

A word as to the use I shall make of this militia, and of all the troops at the command of the State. No sentence in my former letter is an "inconsiderate utterance." No word in it justifies the construction that I will array my State in "armed antagonism against the confederacy." On the contrary, I will use the troops to support all the just rights and constitutional powers of the confederacy to the fullest extent. No State is truer to the confederacy than Georgia, and none will make greater sacrifices to maintain its rights, its just powers, and its independence. * * * But while I will employ all the force at my command to maintain all the constitutional rights of the confederacy and of my State, I shall not hesitate to use the same force to protect the same rights against external assaults and internal usurpations. Those who imagine themselves to be the confederacy, and consider only loyalty to themselves loyalty to it, and who recognize in neither the people nor the States any rights which conflict with their purposes or future designs, doubtless see in this the "foreshadowing of a guilty purpose." It is, to say the least of it, a fixed purpose.

It is not only my right but my duty to uphold the constitutional rights of the people of Georgia, by force if necessary, against usurpation and abuses of power by the central government. The militia is, under the constitution, one of the proper instrumentalities for that purpose.

Again:

No military authority, State or confederate, can be lawfully used for any other purpose than to uphold the civil authorities, and so much of it as the constitution of my country has confided to my hands shall be used for that purpose, whether civil society, its constitution and laws, shall be invaded from without or from within. Measured by your standard, this is doubtless disloyalty. Tested by mine, it is a high duty to my country.

* * * * * * *

Doubtless you are right, as this is unquestionably the first instance in the annals of either the old or new confederacy of such a call made by the president. It presents the isolated case of an attempt by the president to single out a particular State, and, by grasping into his own hands its whole military strength, to divest it of its last vestige of power to maintain its sovereignty; not only denying to it the right (plainly reserved in the constitution) to keep troops in time of war when actually invaded, but claiming the power to deprive it of its whole militia, and leave it not a man to aid in the execution of its laws, or to suppress servile insurrection in its midst. As no such requisition was ever before made upon any State, and it probably never entered into the mind of any statesman that such a call ever would be made, it never became necessary to question the right to make it.

Mind, I am reading this to show that the extreme doctrines of the seceders failed in their own time of need, and they found themselves upon the very verge of civil war in defense of the doctrines of State rights and secession, against their own confederacy. And the statement filed by General Sherman in the War Department goes in the same direction. It is not a personal matter. It is a matter of serious interest to which the Senate has a right.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the extracts which the Senator from Connecticut has read from the correspondence between President Davis and myself I will not say are garbled, but they are selected extracts. The correspondence is a very voluminous one, and when it is all read it shows that the president of the Confederate States and the governor of Georgia differed about some important questions; and they had a pretty sharp correspondence, which, as I stated in my remarks a while ago, I do not propose to reopen. I stand upon that correspondence as it is. It is too long to read to the Senate that it may be fully understood; but it has passed into history, and I am willing to be judged by it.

I can again state (for the Senator from Connecticut did not seem to understand me) the reason why I did not turn over those troops. It was, as the point is made clearly in the correspondence, if it were all read, that they were a class of troops that the president of the Confederate States had no right to call out—a class for which he made requisition on no other State. They had been organized by the State for State defense; they had been placed under the command of General Johnston, and when he was removed under the command of General Hood; they were in the trenches defending Atlanta at the time requisition was made upon me for them, and, as I stated, with the exception of the short furlough they got they remained in service until they were surrendered to General Wilson after the surrender of Lee and Johnston. In the mean time they had, with my consent, crossed into South Carolina and fought the battle of Honey Hill under General Gustavus W. Smith, where they gained an important victory. Everywhere on the field they were gallant men and good soldiers; but they were composed of State officers, county officers, old men above 50 years of age and boys under 17, and therefore they were a class not embraced in any statute of the Confederate States. I confess I thought the requisition very extraordinary at the time, and as they were doing good service I let them remain where they were till General Hood left the State, and refused to turn them over to be sent at the will of the president to another State or another command.

That is about all I desire to say. I wish the Senator from Connecticut had time to read the whole correspondence, but I would not wish the Senate to be burdened with it at present as it is quite lengthy.

Mr. HAWLEY. A single word. As an original secessionist in theory, the Senator from Georgia ought not to avoid the precise issue here. He then as governor of Georgia acted upon his own doctrines, his own theories of the sovereignty of the States. It was not, bear in mind, a difference of opinions as to military policy, not a question as to whether he should retain his troops for the defense of the soil of Georgia. He retained them distinctly that he might have a weapon of defense against the usurpations of centralized power, and he gave that to be understood by the confederate government in language that is unmistakable. I do no injustice to his whole letter in quoting these paragraphs, for they stand by themselves and are virtually the syllabus of columns of argument. He said to them:

I have an organization of gallant, fearless men, ready to defend the State against usurpations of power as well as invasions by the enemy.

* * * * * * *

The president must have had some other motive in making the requisition, and I think it not uncharitable under all the circumstances to conclude that the object was to grasp into his own hands the entire control of the whole reserve militia of the State.

Is it necessary that I read several columns of preliminary and subsequent explanation and argument? That is sufficient of itself.

The troops—

He says again—

are her only remaining protection against the encroachments of centralized power. I therefore decline to comply with or fill this extraordinary requisition.

Mr. BROWN. I do not see that the Senator throws any new light on the question. I have already stated that I was a secessionist, and I stood by all the doctrines of the secessionists at that time, and I meant all that I said in this correspondence; but, as I have already stated, I do not propose to reopen that discussion. I am on the record, and I am willing to be judged by the record.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] to the amendment proposed as section 5 by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

Mr. CULLOM. If there is nothing further to be said in favor of the two amendments before the Senate, I hope the Senate will vote both of them down.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to have both the amendments proposed by the Senator from North Carolina and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina is, after section 4, to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 5. That it shall be a discrimination prohibited by this act if any railroad company shall charge, demand, or receive more for any package when shipped singly than for each of a number of like packages when shipped by the car-load, or in any greater quantity or number or in any less quantity or number than a car-load, the design and intent of this act being to secure an absolute equality in rates between small and large shippers and consignees; except that a greater rate may be charged and demanded of shippers or consignees for freight shipped in less quantities than a car-load when such freight consists of horses, cattle, hogs, sheep, or other live-stock, or of wheat, oats, corn, barley, or other grain shipped in bulk and not put up in sacks, barrels, boxes, or other packages, or of pig, or bar, or slab iron, or of iron ore or other mineral ore, or of coal, coke, or coal-oil in a single tank or package to the car-load, or of lumber, logs, or firewood, or of any other commodity usually shipped or transported in bulk and by the car-load; but there shall be no difference or discrimination in rate as between shippers and consignees of the above-excepted articles, whether such shipment shall be made by a single car-load or by a greater number of car-loads: Provided, That 10 per cent. may be charged and received for the same amount of freight when shipped in single packages, and less than a car-load, in addition to the established charge on the same kind of goods, wares, or merchandise when shipped in like packages by the car-load, if the freight on all the articles shipped to the same consignee, to be delivered at the same point and at the same time, shall be less than $20.

The amendment to the amendment is to strike out the proposed section and insert the following in lieu thereof:

And be it further enacted, That no merchant shall sell a larger package or quantity of goods at a smaller per cent. than he charges for a smaller package of goods of like quality, if the goods have been produced or transported from another State so as to fall within the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, when the Senator from Georgia first offered that amendment to the amendment I was nonplussed to ascertain what his motive really was. I was inclined in the first instance to consider it a piece of rudeness toward a brother Senator, but I reflected upon his well-known character for suavity and kindness of heart, and I came to the conclusion that I was wrong in that. I then thought it must be intended as a joke. I reflected, however, and came to the conclusion that I was wrong, for whatever may be said of the Senator's career as a public man, I do not believe that a successful joke has ever been attributed to him, and I thought that I would as soon suspect him of dancing a jig on the floor of the Senate as of undertaking the perpetration of a joke upon a brother Senator. So, having viewed the whole ground over, I was forced to the conclusion that the Senator was in dead earnest; that he would not trifle with the Senate by a joke; that he would not do anything disrespectful or discourteous to a brother Senator, and that he was doing his level best to remedy the grievances of which the people complain in regard to railroad transportation.

I am satisfied that he really does believe that there is no difference between the relation which a private individual holds to the public in trade and that which is due from an official of the public in the shape of a railroad corporation. I am satisfied that he really believes that the power given by the Constitution to regulate commerce between the States applies to the sale of a pair of shoes at a Georgia cross-roads after the shoes have come from Massachusetts into Georgia, and as such I am compelled to treat the amendment with seriousness.

Now, sir, what is there in the amendment which I had the honor to offer that would call for an attempt to cumber it in this way for the purpose of defeating it? Was not the Senator already satisfied that the amendment which I offered could not pass this body? If he was not, I can not give him credit for the penetration which I supposed him to possess.

What is the matter with the amendment which I have offered? Wherein is it subject to such an assault as is made upon it in the amendment of the Senator from Georgia? Is there really and in good faith a desire to remove the grievances of which the people complain in regard to railroad transportation? If so, why shut one door of the building and leave all the others open? You propose by the bill, and I presume it meets the approbation of the Senator from Georgia, to close one important door in providing that a carrier shall not discriminate between persons for whom the like service is rendered; that is to say, as to freights carried over the same road between the same points, and in the same amount, one shall not have the advantage over the other. As long as you leave it in the power and discretion of the railroad corporations to prescribe the unit of quantity in the classification of their freights, as to what is wholesale and what is retail, you may pass all the bills like this that our statute-book can be loaded with, and they will evade them by increasing the unit of quantity so as to give their friends favors, and to discriminate against those they dislike, just the same as though no law were passed.

To make myself understood: Suppose the unit be a single package, as a barrel of flour; the amendment which I propose is to the effect that a carrier shall not charge more in proportion for that one barrel of flour carried between two given points than he shall charge the shipper of a thousand barrels of flour carried between the same points; that the barrel shall bear the same charge, the one or the thousand, and no more. It will be in the power of the operators, if this bill shall pass, to make the car-load the unit of quantity and to discriminate against the man who ships only a car-load and in favor of the man who ships a whole train-load. So I say it is patent that so long as you leave railroad corporations acting as carriers the power to classify as they please and the discretion to nominate the unit of quantity which shall distinguish wholesale from retail shipping, you might as well abandon the bill altogether if you reject the amendment which I offer.

I put forth my amendment I thought modestly. I admitted, as I always do when discussing this great subject, the great difficulty of legislating intelligently without doing as much harm as good. I acknowledged that. I went on to say that on business principles my amendment could not be justified. I went on to say that a private individual had a right to sell cheaper by the wholesale than he did by retail. He has the right not only to do that, but he has the right to give away his goods to those he favors; he owes no duty to the public; but I undertook to show a distinction between him and a railroad official, who is a public servant. Is that denied? Why, sir, it is held by the greatest legal minds in this country that the railroad companies and their agents are public servants. They are created for public purposes; they have extraordinary powers and privileges granted to them, and they do not have even proprietary rights in the roads which they operate, for they would revert to the State if they ceased to be used for the purposes of their incorporation.

That being so, why can we not regulate with propriety the charges of a railroad corporation as much as we can regulate the conduct of a municipal corporation? Who would bear the idea of a municipal corporation providing that citizens who dealt by the wholesale with that corporation should receive favors not granted to those who dealt by the retail? Suppose, sir, that the proposition was made to pave the streets of a city by charging the cost of that paving to the owners of the property in front of which it passed; and suppose the city should pass an ordinance that the rich man who owned a dozen lots on that street and whose property was worth ten times that of any of his neighbors should be charged upon his property at one-half or at wholesale rates while one of the small tenants in front of which the pavement passed should be compelled to pay the very highest rate. Who would bear such a discrimination as that?

I say to you, Mr. President, and to all who in good faith desire to meet the wishes of the people, to inaugurate a reform in the respect of transportation by the railroads of the country, that they will not believe you if you tinker at this great subject and leave the abuses to go on in the shape of evasion and through the doors which legislation leaves open for them to pass. It is time, or if not now the time will soon be, when the legislators of the country will be compelled to respond to the wishes of the people in this respect. It will not do to say it is not proper for a railroad to be compelled to do differently and to conduct itself differently from that which is required of the private citizen. It will not do, because that is not the law and that was not the object of the creation of these corporations. I want to read to the Senate a short extract from the opinion of one of the greatest lawyers this country has ever produced in regard to this question of operating railroad corporations on strictly business principles; that is, such business principles as control the affairs of private individuals.

I am able to maintain—

Said Judge Black—

I am able to maintain that all the corruption and misgovernment with which the earth is cursed grows out of this fatal proclivity of public servants to make a business of their duty. Recall the worst cases that have occurred in our history and see if every one of them does not finally resolve itself into that. Tweed and his associates in New York; the Philadelphia rings; the carpet-bag thieves; the star-route conspirators; all went into business for themselves while pretending to be engaged in the public service. Oakes Ames distributed the stock of the Credit Mobilier where he thought it would do the most good to himself and others with whom he was connected, and that was business in him who gave and in them that took his bribes. Madison Wells, when he proposed to Mr. Kenner that he would make a true return of the election if he could be assured of getting "$200,000 apiece for himself and Jim Anderson and a less sum for the niggers," had as keen an eye to business as if he had been president of a railroad company instead of a returning board. Certain greedy adventurers made it a business to rob the nation of its lands, and, uniting with Congress, carried it on so magnificently that they got away with an area nearly equal to nine States as large as Pennsylvania. The imposition of the whisky tax, excluding what was held on speculation, was business to the officers and legislators who were sharp enough to anticipate their own votes. You will see on reflection that every base combination which officers have made with one another, or with outside parties, has been a business arrangement, precisely like that which the railroads justify on the sole ground that it is business. The effect is not only to corrupt those who engage in such transactions, but to demoralize all who are tempted by personal and party attachments to apologize for it.

Again he says:

But on the other hand the corporations deny that they owe any responsibility to the State more than individuals engaged in private business. They assert that the management of the railroads, being a mere speculation of their own, these thoroughfares of trade and travel must be run for their interest without regard to public right. If they take advantage of their power to oppress the labor and overtax the lands of the State; if they crush the industry of one man or place to build up the prosperity of another; if they plunder the rich by extortion, or deepen the distress of the poor by discriminating against them, they justify themselves by showing that all this was in the way of business; that their interest required them to do it; that if they had done otherwise their fortunes would not have been so great as they are; that it was the prudent, proper, and successful method of managing their own affairs. This is their universal answer to all complaints. Their protests against legislative intervention to protect the public always take this shape with more or less distinctness of outline. In whatever language they clothe their argument it is the same in substance as that with which Demetrius, the silversmith, defended the sanctity of the temple for which he made shrines: "Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth."

Now, sir, I have abandoned any hope of seeing this amendment passed; I do not know that it will receive more than one vote besides my own; but it is in the right direction, and twenty years from now, if not sooner, some man will rise in this Senate when I am here no longer perhaps, and will point to this amendment as the beginning of the proper application of the remedy to the complaints of the people.

With these remarks, sir, I submit my amendment to its untimely fate.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I wish to treat with respect the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. I always listen respectfully to the ideas put forward by him. Sometimes the Senator, however, says things that are only to be met by a sympathetic chord of laughter, but this is not one of them. He has said one thing in which I most heartily concur, and that is that the subject he is dealing with is one not only of great importance but of the greatest difficulty, and the difficulty is lest in righting one admitted wrong we shall commit another and perhaps far greater, and whether in righting a wrong we shall trench upon a field fraught with danger to the rights of property and the rights of labor; in other words, to all rights that laws are intended to secure.

It is true that, common carriers as constituted being incorporated transportation companies, usually the railways are termed quasi-public corporations, and you may call them public contractors, and their duty of carrying a public duty; but is it not also true that this public duty is created by their assumption of the business of common carriage of merchandise and by the aggregation of the property of many individuals under the name of a corporation? Is not the corporation as a political entity based on separate subscriptions of their private property by individuals? If therefore it be an employment of the property of a number of individuals acting in combination as an agency for the use of the public and for the benefit of themselves, the natural and essential laws of property and the laws of its employment can not be disregarded. If it be true that a man can afford, as my friend says, to take a smaller percentage of profit by increasing the scale of his operations, or to use his own phrase, to make a wholesale profit at a less rate than he can a retail profit, can that fact and that principle in the use of property be denied or disregarded whether the ownership of the property so employed is in one man, or in the hands of ten, or in the hands of an aggregate of owners acting under a corporation? It seems to me we deal always with the same thing in the end and the same laws for the profitable or unprofitable employment of capital will necessarily prevail.

It may be that for the safety of the public there should be freedom of contract, which is permitted between individuals and which in my judgment is the very soul and essence of liberty; for if a man be not free to contract as he pleases for his labor and for its fruits, for his property, or for aught that belongs to him, it is idle to call him a freeman. Public policy has restricted and does restrict the powers of corporations more than it ventures to do in the case of an individual, for the common definition of corporate powers found in every hornbook of the law is that a corporation may do only those things that it is authorized by its special charter to do, and may not act ultra vires; it may not act outside of the letter of its creation. Not so with the individual. He may do anything that the law does not forbid him to do. But when we come to the laws of property acting for its own increase, acting as an agent for private or for public benefit, it seems to me that its laws of existence, of profit and loss, must be the same, and that which will destroy and bankrupt the individual carrier will destroy and bankrupt the aggregation of carriers under the name and title of a corporation. Is not this so? I put it to my friend from North Carolina, whose sympathy with those who are weaker and poorer and have but the single barrel and the single package to be carried I greatly admire; but I do not think it in his power or in my power, or in the power of the Congress of the United States, to deprive property of its natural strength and advantages.

If my friend from North Carolina shall show me that the laws which control the profitable employment of property are changed, when they are applied to the aggregated property of individuals or to a great amount of property, or a less amount in a single individual's hands, he will have shed a new light on my mind and he will have gone far to control me in the vote I shall cast on these questions; but I confess that I do not see how the principle is altered by dealing with smaller or larger amounts of property engaged in the same business. I do not see how the principle that controls profit and loss is altered by simply collecting a number of men and applying to their property under joint action and control a different rule than we apply to single individuals.

My friend's illustration, I say with due respect to him, is not sound. He likens the question of common carriage and transportation of merchandise, the single barrel or the single trunk or the 10,000 barrels or the 10,000 trunks, as being the same thing with the square yards of pavement which by law are laid in front of a man's property. That is scarcely a just simile. In one case it is true that the individual is involuntarily burdened by the cost and lien of the improvement, but that is not the case in the carriage of his merchandise. A pavement laid down in front of my house or his is used and traversed at will by every other citizen of the community. The pavement in front of his house is as much open to me for my use as that in front of my own. It is therefore a public work; it is not meant for him alone. It attaches as a burden to the land that he owns, and it is a public tax that must be equal under the terms of a general public law. They must be applied equally; if not they are certainly not justified in law or under any system of republican government. It is said that similes are very apt to mislead, and in this case the comparison is not sound nor the simile applicable.

The contract between the owner of merchandise and the carrier is a voluntary contract between those two. It is not a question of a law laying a tax for the use of others as well as for the person who is compelled to pay it. You can not divest it of the nature of a voluntary contract, which is a very different thing from a tax. A tax is the involuntary payment of the property of the individual, for what? For public use; and so the pavement is laid for public use. When you come to the question of transportation a very different and another element comes in; first the contract is voluntary, and next it is for private and not for public purposes, although one of the contracting parties may have certain public duties and functions attached to the performance of his duty of transportation. But I submit to the Senator whether he does not think that in the end the laws which naturally and necessarily control in the employment of property will prevail, so that if a contract or system of business which would beggar and bankrupt an individual was attempted to be pursued by an aggregation of individuals acting under the name of a corporation, the end of the corporation, as sure as the night follows the day, would be the same as that of the individual, unless there be something which I have yet failed to hear and am not able in my mind to comprehend to show the difference between the two.

It certainly can not be intended in the desire to reform abuses to disturb meritorious and lawful investment and, by the imposition of ruinous conditions, to destroy it, because it would be unjust to the loser, nor would it in any way be beneficial to the public. I can not understand how it can be to the benefit of the public to demand conditions for the execution of any business that must end in the ruin of the agency employed in it. The public Treasury might stand it for awhile, and we see in this country that the public Treasury stands a great deal of loss and for a long time; but I am speaking now not of the public Treasury, I am speaking of private treasuries—of the treasuries of the corporations created by the laws of the States or of the United States. Unless my friend can show that there is a difference in the laws of property, separate and aggregate, and that that which would be unfavorable and which will not permit one to exist will permit the other to exist, then I submit to him that his amendment is in violation of what he himself has stated to be the common consent and opinion of men, that a man can perform wholesale at a scale and rate of profit that would beggar him if he attempted to apply the same rate to retail transactions.

I remember it was stated once, probably for a different purpose, that the father of perhaps the greatest statesman that England ever produced, Sir Robert Peel, was a very wealthy manufacturer, and that his profit per yard upon the cotton cloth he manufactured was not more than the eighth part of a farthing. Who could pretend upon a retail and restricted manufacture to maintain such business at all? How was it to be maintained? Only by the enormous scale of manufacture to which that fraction of a farthing applied upon every yard, and by multiplying the yards from tens to tens of thousands he obtained a profit that enabled a great business to be conducted of vast proportions. But shrink those proportions to the measure of a retail trade and the business would be absolutely impossible. It is equally so in regard to the business of transportation. I know that I pay and my friend pays more to the carman who carries a barrel of sugar from the grocery store to our residence than the profit of the capitalist who refined and manufactured that sugar. How is it done? It is not unreasonable that the man who hauls the barrel should charge 25 cents for carrying a small amount of sugar a short distance to my residence. The sum is small; and by private contract all that is arranged. But if I have not a single barrel but 10,000 barrels to be carted, the cost or the rate of transportation will be reduced in proportion to the extent of the transaction.

There is reason in all things, and there is reason in this; and much as we may desire to relieve inequities we can not forget in the enactment of legislation that it must be conducted upon general and sound principles. If the principles invade the rights of private contract, if the principles invade the natural and necessary laws of property, depend upon it we had better not move in the affirmation of a false principle, nor attempt by such a proposition as this to overthrow laws of trade and industry which will prove themselves to be beyond our control, and for which no statute can ever prove a satisfactory equivalent.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, the concluding proposition of the Senator from Delaware seems to me to amount to this, that if in attempting to adjust the equities between the great corporations of the country and the people we find that the laws we should enact for that purpose would interfere with the profits of the railroads we must stop and go no further. He asks me if I can show that the laws of property which are applicable in the segregate are any ways different from those which are applicable to property in the aggregate. I tell him yes, most undoubtedly—that is, with reference to the purpose to which that property is applied.

Property in the segregate or property in the hands of private citizens has one law applicable to its use. When property is aggregated and then devoted to the service of the public under an incorporation and a contract with the State as to how the public shall be served by that property, then a different law is applicable to that property. If it were not so, there would be an end to the whole subject of regulating railroads or any other public corporations.

Understand what I mean, sir. Here is a coil of rope lying in the storehouse of a merchant. There is one kind of law applicable to the ownership and to the uses of that rope that all private men may avail themselves of. But when that rope passes into the hands of the hangman and it is encircled around the neck of a culprit, then an entirely different law is applicable to the uses which may be made of that rope. My friend himself, when walking through these corridors or on the street, can have my hand placed upon him kindly and his progress impeded without any violation of law; we are private citizens; but if he was armed with the power of the Government in some official capacity and approached me and I laid my hands on him the law would be very different immediately. That is what I mean by the laws of property with relation to the question whether it is owned by private individuals or whether it is dedicated to the public.

He says that my simile about the paving of the streets is not sound and not applicable in this case. I want to ask him, supposing a man was engaged to grade a road at so much per square yard for all earth removed and for all earth filled in, would he have a right under that contract without a stipulation therefor in the contract itself to charge more for the hard places in the road than he did for the soft ones?

Now, sir, a company of men aggregate themselves together and contribute their means and apply to the legislature for a charter of incorporation, giving them perpetual existence and making them a corporate identity, and giving them the sovereign power of the State to condemn the private property of citizens for their use in the face of the Constitution, which says that private property shall only be condemned for public use, and in return for all these privileges they enter into a contract to do the carrying of all the freights of all the citizens between the points embraced in the scope of their proposed road. A citizen comes up with a thousand barrels of flour or bales of cotton to be transported. The corporations say, "We will transport that flour for $1 a barrel over our highway." Another citizen comes up with one barrel of flour or bale of cotton to be transported, and they say, "Inasmuch as you have only one bale this is one of the hard cases in our contract, and we will charge you $2." Would that be right or equitable? Would that be permitted in a public servant?

A private individual would have the right to say that, but here is a corporation that has entered into a contract, a lump contract, if I may borrow an expression used by Judge Black, to carry all the freight of all the citizens offered to them. Have they any right to draw back from the small or hard portions of the contract because there is not so much profit in the one bale as there is in the thousand? That would be, it seems to me, a violation of the ordinary and well-understood principles of equity. The Senator says that the great distinction to be drawn in this case is that a contract with a railroad for the shipment of goods over it is a voluntary contract between the railroad and the shipper.

Mr. President, how much is there that is voluntary between the shipper and the railroad carrier where there is but the one railroad, and where he has no possible means of getting his article to market or of having himself transported unless he takes that one railroad? You step to the office of one of these railroads, the one leading from here South, for instance, which has from the starting point in this city no competition. You look through the window at the agent and you say, "I want a ticket to Columbia, S. C." He hands you out a ticket on which is printed in such close print that no man can read it without magnifying glasses under a very strong light a long list of contracts and terms and conditions on which it will carry you to Columbia, S. C. The train is waiting for you and it is important to go on that train or wait for twenty-four hours. You pay the money for the ticket; you put it in your pocket and you start, and that is called a voluntary contract between the passenger and the railroad company, and they hold him to all the conditions printed on that ticket. So it is with freight. The conditions and stipulations in a bill of freight upon the railroads are so long, some of them, that it is a job almost equal to reading for a law license to go through with them; and the shipper has no earthly means of transporting his freight to market except by that road; and he therefore swallows his objections and his indignation and makes a voluntary contract with the road to get that freight carried rather than to walk and carry it on his shoulders! That is what is called voluntary! Why, Mr. President, looking at it in its proper light, there is no greater instance of compulsion, of tyranny exercised over the citizen, known to our Government than this very thing of railroad transportation. You have to take their conditions, or you can stay at home and let your freight rot, because you can not help yourself.

It is true the law does give the privilege of taking your freight in your hand and walking where you choose to go. The law does not force you to take it by pains and penalties, it is very true, in a free country like this. It is said that a man has the right to go barefooted if he can not buy a pair of shoes. Precisely in the same way are all these contracts voluntary.

I hope, Mr. President, I shall never hear the exactions of railroad companies justified again on the ground that there is a voluntary contract between them and their patrons. If that is voluntary, may the Lord preserve me from that which is compulsory! [Laughter.]

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from North Carolina permit me to suggest one thought in connection with the argument of the Senator from Delaware?

If there were but one wholesale house having a monopoly of sales of particular merchandise the analogy might have some force; but in the case of railroads in some portions of the country, and in mine certainly, the roads have an absolute monopoly of transportation. It is an utter impossibility for us to get anything from the State of Texas North, except under the Gould system, which has the absolute control of every line leaving the State.

Mr. VANCE. Of course I thank the Senator from Texas for the suggestion. That is, however, upon a branch of the subject that I was not undertaking to discuss. The general scope of the bill, as well as what has been said in favor of its general features here, all seem to admit on the part of everybody that legislation is competent, and that some legislation is necessary. I have just undertaken to show, in my disconnected way, that if we are really in good faith to stop the flow of grievances and exactions that pour out from these corporations upon the people we must stop all the doors and outlets, and not a few.

I refer again to the principle of my amendment, that if you can forbid discriminations as between man and man who ship the same distance you can forbid discriminations between the great shipper and the poor shipper, between the one who ships largely and the one who ships singly according to his means; and of all discriminations of which the people complain I say that is the worst, because it is a discrimination against a man simply because he is poor. If he is rich enough to fill a car or to lade a train with his products, he is favored by the system of the railroad corporations which the Senator from Delaware says is the law of business. I say, if the man whose poverty only enabled him to produce a small amount of freight to be carried is to be discriminated against because of that inability to do better, it would be the very worst and the most shameful of all the discriminations which our law permits these corporations to make. It would be bringing to the actual test the truth of the proverb of Scripture, that "the destruction of the poor is their poverty."

Sir, it is always understood in all governments which protect property that the rich and the great can take care of themselves, and that the first object of the Government is, or should be, to protect the weak. With that view I am not ashamed to stand here and advocate the cause of the small dealers and small shippers of the country as against the advantages which our laws confer upon the great traffickers and dealers.

If we are to be told that the laws of property, like those of the Medes and Persians, are immutable and can not be changed; if we are to be told that what is writ is writ; that we must not interfere, and that we must pass no laws whatsoever which will interfere with the business arrangements of the corporations, then we might as well give this thing up in fact, as we really do by our shilly-shally legislation. We might as well say that the corporations of this country are beyond human control. We might as well say that a State Legislature has created an incorporeal something and given it "a local habitation and a name," if it could not give it any soul, that thereafter could set the Legislature and its laws forever at defiance. We might as well say that it is in the power of men to create a thing that is greater than its creator; and we might as well confess the inability of human legislation to protect human weakness.

Mr. BAYARD. I am sure that my friend from North Carolina is really a very modest man, but no one would imagine it who considered the effect of his last declarations to the Senate, because it comes to this, that if the amendment he has now offered is not accepted, then there is to be a delivery over of this country to the unchecked rapacity of corporate power, for which no remedy can ever be found.

Although the amendment may not be adopted, I suspect that there would still be a great reserve of wisdom yet left in the mind of the Senator who offered it, and that he may be able to present an amendment that will obviate the difficulties and not be open to the objections which I respectfully submitted for his consideration.

I think when my friend comes to read the debate to-morrow as it is published, he will find that the propositions I submitted to him have not been answered by him. I know that the question is one of grave importance. I know that it is one in regard to which popular feeling is much interested. If I have learned one thing about the Government of this country, one thing that makes that Government possible of permanent success, it is just this, that where a public representative has a clear and distinct conviction upon a public subject he can perform no public duty so valuable as frankly to declare it, and that the people of this country will be served far more by the faithful delivery of independent and actual judgments than they can ever be by any advocacy, however eloquent or plausible, which takes the side of numbers, or of what seems to be the side of popular power, or power under any name or in any shape it may appear.

I was not discussing this great question in the interests of the transportation companies. I was not discussing the question in the interests of the retail shipper. I was trying to discover the safe and true principle upon which we safely could proceed to lay down general laws for the government of a vast amount of property, for it is with property in countless shapes and almost limitless value that we are proposing to deal, and it is with private property, not the property of the public, that we are proposing to deal. I asked the question (it was not answered) whether you do change the essential laws of property by increasing the amount or changing the ownership of the property in relation to which those laws are to be exercised. It is not the question of the poverty or the wealth of the shipper. It is not the question of the wealth of the corporation or of the individual opposing it. That is not the question. It is whether or not property in all its various shapes can be made subservient to human interest in violation of those economical laws that attach themselves to its use and are commonly recognized as essential to its preservation and increase.

My friend drew a picture—ad captandum vulgus—that the shipment of the single bale by the poor farmer should be treated differently as to rates of transportation from the shipment of the five hundred bales by his wealthier neighbor, and he said it was not a voluntary contract. Certainly my friend was not just in stating my position on that point. He had likened the dealings with a railroad company or any other transportation company with a payment of a tax upon the pavement in front of a man's house. I said that one was a public exaction for public use only, in which the convenience or the wishes of the individual were not regarded, a tax prescribed by general law, enforced by general law upon an equal scale of payment, in which all the citizens of the community, rich and poor, black and white, male and female, stood alike, in regard to the execution of which they were not consulted; and I said that laying a tax which was to build the public pavements in a city and laying that by a general law that made it an equal tax on all was a very different thing from prescribing rates for the carriage and transportation of property without the regard to the laws of traffic that control the capacity to carry more or less at a profit or at a loss—to carry a larger amount of merchandise at a lower rate proportionately than a smaller amount.

Now, let us suppose that the Senator from North Carolina and others of his friends should desire to ship, not in great quantities, but by small quantities, along the lines of railway, or the honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY], who made a suggestion to him in the course of this discussion. Suppose they went to the Legislature of Texas or of North Carolina and they said, "We desire to build a railway through a certain section of country which we think will be profitable; carve out for us from the eminent domain of the State the right to condemn certain private lands along the route, and give us a charter that will enable us to build this road." Suppose the Legislature said to them, "We will give you this charter, and we will grant you the right of way through the lands of all these private parties, but you must take it on condition that you will carry a single basket or package or bale or barrel for the same rate and the lowest rate you charge for the greatest number of packages," what would be the answer to that? Both the gentlemen to whom I have referred are men of strong practical sense, accustomed to the care and management of property. They would know that they could conduct that business of transportation only by following the laws which control that business. I mean by the laws of economical management essential to the profitable management of that business, the laws of profit and of loss. If they were compelled to carry these things by retail at the same prices they would carry them by wholesale they would know that bankruptcy awaited their enterprise. No one would perceive it quicker; no one would sooner advise stockholders not to put their money in such an enterprise, and the railroad would never be constructed.

That is what I meant by the laws of property, that you can not change the principles upon which men make and lose money in their occupations by changing the person who is to exercise the occupation. That which a man can afford to do wholesale at a low scale of profit and rely upon the extent of his business as the source of his remuneration, he can not do if his occupation is diminished to a small scale. That is of every-day proof. The profit of the great manufacturer is but the fraction of a penny per yard. It has been stated by distinguished economists who are worthy of influence that one-half of 1 cent a yard upon cotton cloth will give the control of the markets of the world to the nation that can manufacture it that one-half cent per yard cheaper. Yet what is such a profit as that half cent in ratio compared to the ordinary profit of retail? A retail shopkeeper will starve and die upon such a ratio of profits. Such a per centum can not and will not satisfy the necessities of his life And yet increase the scale of the manufacturer and you may bring in enormous fortune, as I have endeavored to illustrate in the case of Sir Robert Peel's father, and instances of which our own country is full every day. That is what I mean.

I have nothing to say in the way of defense of the transporting companies. I am not here defending any abuse. I am not the less sensible of the abuses and inequities that may be perpetrated by those who have the control or monopoly as has been suggested. That is not the question. I am asking Senators how can you make some general law which will do away with this power? You do not mean to do away with the roads themselves, and therefore, when you propose a measure, I ask you only to look to it that you do not reach results unjust and disastrous that you have not contemplated. It is not your intention to destroy property; it is your intention to regulate property; and if you seek to put upon property a regulation that will be destructive of it, you have reached a result that you certainly have not intended.

We are dealing with a subject that is not to be met by the question of its popularity or its unpopularity. He will serve the people best who tells the people the truth. I hold that a man's right to have the truth told to him is not to be controlled by his poverty or by his wealth. I was tempted to come unprepared into this debate by asking a respectful question of my friend from North Carolina as to whether property changed its laws by changing the amount in which it was held or the hands that held it.

Mr. VANCE. If the Senator will permit me, I think I answered that question. I said that the laws did change when the function of the property was changed, when the property was devoted to the service of the public instead of the private citizen who owned it.

Mr. BAYARD. Then must not the property be the property of the public? If we are to impose such regulations upon it as are now proposed it must be in some way the property of the public, else we will be coming near confiscation. I agree that you can and ought to regulate the powers of public corporations. I have said so distinctly. I have endeavored to state what is a mere hornbook definition, that you restrict corporations necessarily to the powers contained in their charter, and outside they are without power to act. However, I do mean to say you may let wealth stand in single hands or you may incorporate it, but you can not make an individual or an aggregation of individuals pursue a business on principles that will result in loss without producing the same result in the case of individual or corporation alike.

That is what I mean. And I here state in the presence of my two friends from Texas and North Carolina that they themselves could not and would not embark their capital, nor permit their friends to embark their private fortunes, upon a business that was not to be conducted according to those sound rules of profit and loss which the business itself declares to be essential, and that is, that much may be carried and always will be carried at a lower proportion than little. I need not illustrate the question of a single car running half full or wholly full. It is plain that if the car is to be filled or if the train is to be filled, the same expense and power of traction that will carry the many would practically carry the few, and of course they could afford to carry many packages at a less ratio of price than they could carry a few. We can not get rid of those facts. No discussion about whether it is the case of the poor man who sends the single bale of cotton, or the larger shipper who sends down a multitude of wagons and carts loaded with produce, can change the fact.

I suspect that my heart would respond just as quickly as that of my friend from North Carolina to the fact that the one man was very poor, and that he was put to a great disadvantage; but I am afraid we never shall be able to rectify the inequalities of fortune. The poor always will be with us, and I do not think we shall help them by breaking down those laws of property which every poor man hopes to procure, and which the institutions of this country are intended to facilitate him in procuring. Thrift, industry, and enterprise we encourage; the history of this country proves that they have encouragement.

We scarcely have a hereditary millionaire in the country. Almost all our men of greatest fortune are those who earned their first dollars by the toil of their hands. All over the country this is so.

I am not one who looks with any satisfaction upon the great and growing disparity of fortune. I regret it, and I recognize some of the causes for it. But will that induce me to vote for an amendment or to vote for a law which I think will make the possession of property insecure and the use of property impracticable? Oh, no.

I know the subject is difficult, but I do not think this amendment makes it less so. On the contrary, it is a step, as I think, in a dangerous direction. I shall be glad to vote for something that shall remedy, if we can, the inequities of this system of rebates, discriminations, and other monopolistic features. I have sometimes thought, and I think I am pretty nearly right about it, that the best cure for many of these inequities and for much of this monopoly and for much of this extortion is the competition and the free competition, to aid in which corporate power is to be granted for the purpose of lowering rates and creating that wholesome struggle for the same object which will result in the cheapening of the service. All that I recognize; and I confess that in regard to this bill, not having been a member of any committee charged with it, not having essayed the very difficult task of framing it, I have the fullest sympathies in opposition to those who create these abuses and inequities and all the other things that tend to strain the laws of property and the law that makes property possible at all. I read an article the other day upon the dangerous classes of this country, and they were not those who were poor or who were personally turbulent; they were those who, holding great estates and vast wealth and consequent power, forgot the ties of humanity for the responsibilities that are due by its possessors, and have ceased to remember that there is a justice between man and man that must be respected, or laws without it, and institutions without it, will fail.

Mr. SHEFFIELD. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, because I believe it is one that Congress has no right to pass. I am opposed also to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, and for reasons which I will state in a moment. I favor the bill which was reported by the Senator from Illinois. I should not favor it if I believed it constituted a supplemental Congress, as was suggested by the honorable Senator from Arkansas, for the purpose of legislating for railroads, or a supplemental judiciary to determine the rights of railroads or the relative transactions of business between them and their customers. But I believe the bill is the exercise of a police power on the part of Congress to superintend the carrying on of interstate commerce by these great corporations, and I consent to support it because it affects corporations which, unless they are controlled by Congress, I fear will override the nation.

They are private corporations, created for private profit and gain. Although the railroads were constructed for private profit, according to my conception of their duty and their relations to the State they are charged with public uses, and it is the public use with which they are charged that authorizes them to take private property for their purposes. These corporations are created by the States, and over their charters I apprehend Congress has no power. They lie beyond its control and rest secure in the grants upon the conditions on which they have received them, within the territory of the respective States. Congress has no power, though I might apprehend it had from what I have heard since I have listened to this dissussion, over their private charters. They hold them by a tenure which has been granted them by the States from which they derive their existence. The only power which Congress has over these corporations is in regard to the execution of the public duties with which they are charged, to wit, their duty as common carriers; and Congress has precisely the same rights over any other person who holds the relation of common carrier to the public as over these corporations.

The bill as presented by the honorable Senator from Illinois undertakes to superintend the carrying out of the public duty with which the corporations are charged. The amendment of the honorable Senator from North Carolina does not propose, perhaps, directly to pass a bill of altainder (a bill of attainder, as I understand it, is to take away a man's property without process of law), but it undertakes to do the same thing by indirection; and what is that indirection? It is to render that property in the hands of its owners entirely valueless. That is the aim, that is the end, it seems to me, of the amendment which is proposed. To that, sir, I am opposed.

I do not wish, under the circumstances of this case, to occupy much of the attention of the Senate; but other questions lie behind this, I apprehend. Many of these railroads have certain chartered rights. If I mistake not—and I appeal to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to correct me if I am in error—some of the charters of that Commonwealth granted to railroad companies are limited. In other words, the State has reserved the right to control the prices, the charges, of the corporations when their profits rise to a certain amount which is named in their charters.

Mr. HOAR. My impression is that the legislation goes a little further than that. Of course that right exists in our general power to amend, alter, or repeal the charters, but we also provide that the State may take a road when by the running of the road the profits on the capital stock reach a certain amount.

Mr. SHEFFIELD. Certainly; and then the State pays the original capital with a certain profit on it. That is the case, I think, with the charter of the Boston and Albany road and, perhaps, the Boston and Providence road. In the case of the charters of some of the roads in Rhode Island the Legislature is to interfere when the profits amount to a particular percentage. I think when they amount to 10 per cent. on the capital the Legislature has the power to interfere to reduce the fares, expressly in so many words. That being the case, it would be impairing the contract upon the faith of which the companies built the roads to undertake to interfere with those corporations in the way proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. By a police power to regulate merely, to superintend the carrying on of interstate commerce, to see that they do no injustice between individuals, between A and B, or between the village of A and the village of B, places which are on the line or individuals on the line, is a very different thing from the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from North Carolina. I am opposed to that amendment, and, without taking more of the time of the Senate, I express the hope that the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, just a word more before my bantling is consigned to the dust of the valley, and I will cease to vex the Senate. I want to say that the general proposition so vehemently urged and insisted upon by the Senator from Delaware is not a correct one, to wit, that it is impossible for men on business principles to carry a single package for the same price that they carry one of a number of packages of the like kind. I want to say that in fact there is no such thing; it is not true. The number of small shippers is infinitely greater than the number of great shippers, and in the aggregate their products amount to more than those of the great shippers. It is just as easy for a railroad corporation to carry fifty barrels of flour for fifty men as it is to carry fifty barrels of flour for one man, and there is just as great profit in the transaction.

If the general propositions laid down by the Senator from Delaware are correct we are wasting the time of the Senate and of the country in talking about a bill regulating interstate railroads, because he says that a corporation can not be conducted by different laws from those which control private property. Now, private property seeks whatever investment it desires in any conceivable direction, uncontrolled and unregulated by law, and if we are to invest corporations with the same privilege we announce to the country that corporations can use their property in any manner and in any direction that they see proper uncontrolled by the law. If that be so, why do we undertake to deceive the people and to soothe their complaints and irritations by tinkering with the subject at all?

I say, sir, that I did answer the Senator's question when I showed him, or undertook to show him at least, that the law applicable to property when it was devoted to the service of the public and controlled by public agents was different from property in the hands of private persons. If that proposition is not true, again I say there is an end of the question.

The Senator says that business can not be conducted on other principles than those eliminated by the experience of private capital I say that it can be; that one of the greatest businesses of this country is now conducted upon precisely the same principle advocated by the amendment, and successfully conducted, to wit, the carrying of the mails of the country. The Senators here and other public functionaries who are receiving about this time, at least those on this side of the Chamber are, and sending off perhaps a hundred letters a day, to say nothing of other mail matter, receive no rebate from the Government on account of the wholesale character of their correspondence; and while they are charged the full amount of the postage as fixed by our statute, the boy who is writing from the prairies of the West home to his mother a single solitary letter once a year to let her know how he is getting on pays the same price, to wit, 2 cents per letter. That business is conducted on precisely the same principles on which I propose to have the carrying business of this country conducted—absolute equality to all. Does any Senator advocate a reduction in price to the wholesale patron of the mails? Does any Senator advocate that the writer of a single letter in a week, a month, or a year shall be charged twice or quadruple or ten times as much as the one who writes four or five letters a day? That is the business principle. Notwithstanding our mail service is conducted on this principle of absolute equality, and notwithstanding the jobbery and the corruption that is sometimes seen to attend its administration and the enormously extravagant methods that we employ to carry mail facilities into all parts of the country the most remote—notwithstanding that, one year with another the Post-Office Department of this country is self-supporting.

Now, why could not the corporations that carry for the public packages of merchandise instead of packages of letters be compelled to observe the same absolute equality? Is there any Senator on this floor who will deny that equality is the rule of right? If equality is the rule of right, do we not violate it when we say to a man, "If you ship only a hundred pounds of freight you shall be charged twice as much as your neighbor who ships a thousand pounds?"

I say to you, Mr. President, as I said but a little while ago, that the time is coming when this question will be considered in quite a different spirit from that in which it is considered now. There are mutterings now to be heard in every quarter of the community. There is a firm and a fixed determination in the hearts of the great body of the American people that the corporations of this country shall not become their masters. They were created to be their servants, and the people are determined that they shall not change that relation. They may be bamboozled for a while. It is a highly technical subject; we all admit that. We must not change the laws of property, it is said; we would do more harm than we would do good, and therefore the only thing to do is to let it alone, or pass bills that will appear to give relief. Shut one door, but leave a dozen open. Stop one leak in the dike, but leave another open through which you could drive a coach-and-six. We may, I say, stave off this discontent a while by those means, but ultimately we will be compelled to see whether the tendency of this age toward the concentration of capital and the exercise of all the power that that confers, shall master this country or whether the people shall rule it.

As I have said before, I am for one not ashamed to stand up here and advocate the rights of the man who has only one bale of cotton to ship as against the privileges granted to the man who has a thousand bales. It subjects me, perhaps, to the imputation of demagogy, my arguments may be called ad captandum vulgus; but, sir, I shall do it nevertheless. If to try to do justice between man and man is to be laughed at, then, sir, like Falstaff, I am not only merry but willing to be a subject of merriment to others. If to try to do something for the weak in the community and to strengthen their hands in the battle of life against those who have been blessed with greater fortune and greater power is a subject of contempt, then I am like the Arkansas judge who was also an auctioneer, who fined a man for contempt of court while selling a mare and colt during a recess of the court, and said in answer to the application to remit the fine on the ground that a contempt could not be committed against him in his private capacity, that whether on or off the bench he was always an object of contempt. [Laughter.] At least I am so informed by the Senator.

I say, therefore, that if it is contemptible and to be laughed at to advocate the rights of the weak against the strong, I shall bare my bosom to the shafts and welcome them, and console myself as Saint Paul did with the reflection, "It is for the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain." And now I am done.

Mr. SEWELL. The Senator from North Carolina, in illustrating by the mail service of the country at the present time, thinks that equality is the rule of right. In connection with that service I would amend his statement by saying that equality is the rule of might. He forgets that the way lines of this country are required practically to carry the mails on the same basis that is fixed for through lines with large quantities of mail matter. The through lines probably get an ordinarily fair compensation, but the way lines, which make up the great portion of the railroad mileage in the country to-day, are carrying mails under the rule of might, the fiat of the Government that they shall have just so much and no more, and rather than kick and throw the mails out, believing that they ought to accommodate the public, they take the pittance that they get. There is no justice about that.

The proposition of the Senator from North Carolina in relation to the transportation of one package at the rate at which fifty or one hundred or five thousand packages would be carried may be illustrated in this way. He is not probably familiar with the system of railroad accounts: A man goes to a station in North Carolina and asks for ten cars for peanuts. It costs just the same and no more to make a way-bill for those ten cars as it does to make a way-bill in the case of the man who totes a bag on his back and asks to have it shipped. That waybill has to go through the same clerks' hands, it costs the same for stationery, it goes to the auditing department of the road, it goes through different hands, goes to the auditing department of the continuous line, and there may be a dozen of them to make up under this interstate commerce bill, and finally is adjusted at the head office; and while the freight on that bag, in proportion to the charges on fifty car-loads, may not amount to five cents, it costs five cents to make up that waybill.

Mr. VANCE. I admit the hardship of the case which the Senator from New Jersey has put, but let us look at it a little further. Suppose a man from New Jersey wanted to ship ten bushels of peanuts from North Carolina, and suppose the Legislature of New Jersey was assembled and waiting for those peanuts to organize, and could not be held together without their accustomed legislative aliment to console the weary hours of law-making, and suppose the hard-hearted railroad should impose a lot of conditions entirely extortionate because of the size of the freight, and tell the shipper that he might do better if he pleased, that it was an entirely voluntary contract, what would become of the Legislature of New Jersey?

Mr. SEWELL. I will simply say that the Legislature of North Carolina may be held together with peanuts but that of New Jersey could not be.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I want to examine for a moment the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. It does not seem to me that he accomplishes the object by the amendment which he has in view or the object which he has stated in his argument. The first portion of his amendment puts small packages upon an equality with larger shipments or car-loads, and provides that no more shall be charged for one sack shipped separately than shall be charged each for a hundred sacks shipped by the car-load. It provides that no discrimination shall be made in favor of large shipments or for the large amount of business tendered; but at the same time the Senator whittles away his amendment until he leaves so little of it that I am not sure but the legal maxim de minimis non curat lex might be applied to it. Let us look a little at it. First, the broad proposition is laid down to which I have referred. Then there is a class of exceptions that come in that is rather a large one, I think:

> Except that a greater rate may be charged and demanded of shippers or consignees for freight shipped in less quantities than a car-load when such freight consists of horses, cattle, hogs, sheep, or other live-stock, or of wheat, oats, corn, barley, or other grain shipped in bulk and not put up in sacks, barrels, boxes, or other packages, or of pig, or bar, or slab iron, or of iron ore or other mineral ore, or of coal, coke, or coal-oil in a single tank or package to the car-load, or of lumber, logs, or firewood, or of any other commodity usually shipped or transported in bulk and by the car-load.

Now, in the first place, you shall not ship a package and charge more for it than you charge for each of a hundred packages shipped in a car-load, but if the car-load is of a character that is shipped in car-loads, then the Senator says his amendment shall not apply. As suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], it does not apply to peanuts. It excepts from its operation the other commodities of North Carolina to a great extent, but it does fail to except the peanut. Then, after excepting all the live-stock he can mention, and the different productions of the farm, and excepting everything else that is usually shipped by car-load, the amendment contains the further provision that if the freight on the package is less than $20 there may be 10 per cent. added to the usual freight. I do not know exactly what is left, and especially when we take into the account another thing, that this can not apply to any shipments made from one point in North Carolina to another, for that is not interstate commerce, and the bill does not apply to any case where the package is sent by express, for we are not legislating for the express companies.

How many packages or what sort of packages would be left for the poor people to get the benefit of them here? All the exceptions I have mentioned, which cover almost everything, are made. Everything that is shipped from one point in North Carolina to another is excepted by the Constitution; everything that is shipped by express of course is excepted; and then every other thing where the freight is less than $20 on the shipment is subject to have 10 per cent. added, which destroys the equality. Then what is left? To what does the amendment apply? There may be a few things, it is true, to which it would apply, but I confess it seems to me the Senator has eliminated the whole force of his amendment by the exceptions he has made to the rule.

While on the amendment I desire most respectfully to call the attention of my friend to another objection. As his amendment stands I think it is subject to as strong a constitutional objection as he makes to my amendment. The language is:

> That it shall be a discrimination prohibited by this act if any railroad company shall charge, &c.

Is it very clear to the Senator from North Carolina that the Senate has any right to legislate to that extent by any kind of bill we can pass? That embraces the Central road of North Carolina or any other road that begins in North Carolina and ends in North Carolina—"any railroad." If he had said "any railroad engaged in interstate commerce," or "any railroad running into another State, shipping goods across the line," or anything of that character, his amendment might be constitutional; but as it stands it is broad and sweeping; it makes no exception whatever, but applies to any railroad company, it does not matter where the railroad company does business or whether it ships packages across the line or not. Therefore, I think he has a constitutional objection to get around in his amendment as well as I have in mine.

The Senator from North Carolina rather convinced me that there was some constitutional objection to my amendment, but I still thought it was as good as his, and that it was as free from constitutional objection as his was; and now if he will withdraw his I will withdraw mine, because I believe there is some constitutional objection to each. But if he insists on his, unless he will amend it so as not to embrace the railroads that are confined within the limits of North Carolina, I shall be obliged to insist on mine as being quite as constitutional as his.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. BROWN. With great pleasure.

Mr. VANCE. If the Senator is in earnest in his objection, he will see at once that the previous sections of the bill confine its operation entirely to roads that run from one State into another, and that the amendment will have no greater operation than the body of the bill to which it is an amendment.

Mr. BROWN. I reply to that that there are no previous sections to the bill. We have not legislated at all on this question. I do not know in what shape any section of the bill is going to be passed. It may be that the previous sections of the bill, when we come to pass upon them, will do nothing to aid this amendment. Therefore it is better to have the amendment constitutional as we go along, unless we had agreed on what should be the other sections of the bill, so that we may bring it within the rule contended for by the Senator from North Carolina.

Therefore, I must still put my amendment against his on constitutional grounds. I say mine is as constitutional as his is. He thought I was disposed to treat his amendment as a joke or in some other such way. I confess that I had a little of that idea at the time, as I know my friend is always fond of a joke; but he very well rebukes me by saying that I never was successful with a joke, and I believe he is right about it.

So it is, I make the proposition that if he will withdraw his amendment I will withdraw mine. I think, probably, the whole thing is rather a joke. It seems to me it is something of a joke to undertake to relieve the people of North Carolina, or of any other State of the Union, by making provision that a small package shall be shipped as cheap separately as a like package in a car-load, and then excepting nearly everything you can think of from the benefit of it, and then making the sweeping provision that if the freights are under $20 there may be 10 per cent. added, which puts the small shipper again upon an inequality with the large shipper.

It seems to me that we ought to do one of two things. We ought to make the bill apply to all cases where we have any constitutional power or we ought not to apply it to any. The fact is that the Senator from North Carolina rather excited my sympathies on this question, and that is one of the reasons why I introduced my amendment. I heard his speech, which was an able one, well delivered. He said:

> If therefore a capitalist can by buying largely get goods at cheaper rates than the small dealer and thus undersell him and break him down, of course this is beyond the reach of legislation, for a man may lawfully do as he will with his own. He owes no duty to the public in this regard, and the law permits him to be selfish.

That is pretty hard, but the Senator from North Carolina did not see any remedy for it, and if there is a constitutional objection to my amendment I do not know whether there is any remedy. Still, I thought I would offer the amendment. Then again he said:

> Those acquainted with the details of the daily business of the people well know that the traders of small means are absolutely at the mercy of their rivals of greater capital in all traffic where freight charges enter considerably into the cost of the article. The big fish are constantly swallowing the little ones.

That excited my sympathy, for I sympathize with the mass of the people as much as the Senator from North Carolina does; but if my amendment will not remedy the difficulty I do not see exactly what other one will. It seems to me his amendment, with all the exceptions he has loaded it with, can not remedy it. Then, again, I did not quite so well understand this phrase of the Senator's speech:

> Therefore when capital buys and sells by the quantity to the injury of small dealers, we can, in either justice or wisdom, say nothing.

It seems to me, if it is an injury, if it is grossly wrong, as in the other case, we can in justice and wisdom say something, whether we can do anything or not. We can hardly admit the justice and equity of it or the justice and wisdom of it. Therefore I can not go as far as my friend from North Carolina goes on that part of it. I do not know that it is entirely just. At least if it is just in that case I do not see why it is not just in all other cases; and under the rule that has been drawn so often, that railroads are corporations and therefore are partly under the control of the public with some of the delegated powers of sovereignty, &c., I do not see what good it does. If the rule is a just one and a wise one as applied to commerce, then I do not see how it can be an outrageous and nefarious rule as applied to small transactions of the character to which the Senator refers. That much I state rather seriously.

My amendment, it seems to me, ought to pass, if the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina passes. If his is to be voted down, then I do not care to insist on mine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

Mr. BROWN. In the hope that the Senator from North Carolina will withdraw his amendment, I shall vote in the negative on mine.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the people whom I represent are very largely interested in this question, and the products of their industry will be found largely in the exceptions to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina. The farmers and graziers of Kansas export annually large numbers of horses, cattle, hogs, and sheep, and a very large amount of wheat, corn, barley, and other grains. I wish the Senator from North Carolina would be good enough to explain to me upon what theory in his amendment the man who wants to ship one horse should not have the same advantage compared with the man who ships a car-load of horses as the man who ships a tub of butter is to have as compared with the man who ships a car-load of butter in firkins. I ask the Senator in entire seriousness, because if there is any method of rectifying by legislation the evils that we all admit to exist, I certainly wish to act with him.

Mr. VANCE. Does the Senator wish an answer now?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. VANCE. I have not my amendment before me, but if the Senator from Kansas will read the amendment which he has in his hand he will see that the exception is made in favor of those large, bulky articles that are usually shipped by the car-load. The Senator will also know, perhaps much better than I do about such things, that the shipment of live-stock ordinarily can not be as the shipment of other freight in this respect; and that it takes at least a car to transport one horse or one head of cattle, while in the case of packages of inanimate freight, as flour, grain, dry goods, &c., one man's package can be as easily placed in a car that is not yet full as it could go in a car by itself; while it would take at least a half car for one or an entire car to accommodate two strange animals; that is, animals strange to each other. A man shipping a number of animals accustomed to each other and reared together could perhaps fill a car with them, whereas in the case of a man shipping another animal in with strange animals they would damage each other—as horses, for instance. For those reasons, whether correct or not, I inserted the exception in the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE. Let us have the yeas and nays upon the amendment. There is an important principle involved in it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GROOME (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. CULLOM (when Mr. KENNA's name was called). The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] informed me that he was called away on account of sickness in his family, and that he is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 4, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—4.

George,	Vance,	Van Wyck,	Vest..

NAYS—44.

Aldrich,	Frye,	Lapham,	Pike,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER].

Mr. SLATER. I desire, before the amendment in the nature of a substitute is put to a vote, to offer two amendments to section 4 of the bill. I move to strike out, in line 1 of section 4, the words "if any transportation company" and insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon on a former occasion to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert his proposed amendment, he moves to amend the text of the bill as will now be read from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the words "if any transportation company" and to insert in lieu thereof:

It shall be unlawful for any transportation company engaged in interstate commerce, directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage in any form upon shipments made or services rendered either in the receiving, handling, storing, or transportation of freight, such freight being classified as interstate commerce, and if any such company so.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any transportation company engaged in interstate commerce, directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage in any form upon shipments made or services rendered either in the receiving, handling, storing, or transportation of freight, such freight being classified as interstate commerce, and if any such company so engaged in interstate commerce shall, directly or indirectly, by any rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person a greater compensation for any service it may render in its transaction of interstate commerce than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person for doing for him, in a like business and under similar circumstances and conditions, a like service, and if any such transportation company shall neglect or refuse to furnish the same facilities for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of interstate-commerce freights to one person that is at the same time furnished to any other person for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of such freights of the same class, such transportation company shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President, section 4 relates to discriminations, and by the terms of it it would seem to interdict anything in the nature of drawbacks or rebates, but on examination it will be found that it only prohibits the use of drawbacks and rebates where they are in such form that an inequality exists. Now, it occurs to me that this door of rebates and drawbacks is one of the fruitful avenues through which discrimination enters. It would be better to phrase our legislation in such form and in such terms as to be an absolute prohibition, to make the language distinct and effective, and this is the purpose and office of the amendment I have now offered, so that all rebates, all drawbacks, all devices which shall operate in any form to make a discrimination shall be illegal and unlawful; and, if I understand the amendment that was attached to the end of this bill, it will be found punishable under another section of the bill, it being declared at the end of the section, I think, to be a misdemeanor. I think it will be better that we put it in this form than leave the opening here for a question to arise whether in a given case a drawback or a rebate is or is not a discrimination. The foundation that I want to put it upon is that all drawbacks, all rebates, are unlawful and prohibited.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I hope that the amendment of the Senator from Oregon will not be adopted. The question that he seems to reach in this amendment he can reach just as well when the substitute which comes before the Senate is up for discussion. This section simply has reference to the question of unjust discrimination, and undertakes to guard against unjust discrimination by whatever means it may be undertaken to be exercised. I hope that the section will remain in the bill as it is written, as I think it reaches the question of discrimination, and is designed to reach that and nothing else.

If it is the judgment of the Senate hereafter that we shall put in statutory form a declaration that there shall under no circumstances be any rebates or any pooling or any drawback, that is a question for consideration that can come up in the discussion of the substitute which the Senator desires to offer, or on the bill known as the Reagan bill, which is now in the Senate, and which will be offered for consideration hereafter.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President, it is true that if the substitute which I have offered should be adopted in preference to the bill now pending this amendment is there included in terms. It is also in terms, I believe, in the House bill, which, as I now believe the understanding to be, shall take the place, and the bill now being perfected in the Senate will be offered as a substitute for that bill. Therefore I desire to test the sense of the Senate in putting this provision into this bill, so that if it shall come to pass that this bill shall be substituted for the House bill we shall have the provision in the bill as it shall pass.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the section of the bill as reported by our committee, to which the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is proposed, declares in the broadest terms for an absolutely equal rate to all shippers. It prohibits under penalties any discriminations between shippers who may make consignments of freight at substantially the same time and of substantially the same class. Now, it may be possible for the managers of railway companies to avoid this, to evade it, and to conceal their evasion so as to escape the penalties of the bill; but that is equally possible under the amendment which the Senator from Oregon offers. So it seems to me that we avoid a question about which there may be some division whether there may not be circumstances under which it might be just for a railroad company to pay back to its shippers some part of the charges which it had received from them. If competition was prevailing between different lines, and it was ascertained after a shipment had been received and the freight paid, as for instance from Chicago to New York, that some other railroad had been carrying freight for its shippers of the same kind and at the same time for a less rate, I do not think it would be immoral. I do not think it would be a transaction that we should make penal, if the railroad company having received the higher rate which turned out to be a discrimination against its patrons should equally and to all who had shipped about the same time refund some part of the charges which it had received. I would not be willing to declare for one as a member of the Senate that it ought to be treated as a misdemeanor.

I am not very well skilled in these matters; perhaps those that are might suggest other cases where with reference to shipments abroad—I have seen that suggestion—it was necessary that some allowance should be made from the freights that had been received in order to enable the shippers to meet the foreign prices and to send their grains abroad.

It seems to me we should be adopting, perhaps, a rule that had too much iron in it if we were to say absolutely that in no case should a railroad company that had received a given rate for the shipment of merchandise return any part of it to the person who had paid it, even if that return was made upon an equal basis to everybody who had shipped at the same time so as to preserve an absolute equality between the shippers. Does the Senator from Oregon think that such a rebate, if it is allowed to all under circumstances which may seem to justify it, such as I have described, ought to be prohibited?

Mr. SLATER. I can not conceive why the case presented by the Senator from Indiana could not be as justly met by a direct reduction of the rate to the point which would be left after a part of the freight had been returned. In case of freight being shipped for foreign ports it would not relieve other shippers, for instance, in shipping from Chicago or other western points to New York, unless the freight shipped from New York on foreign account was at a different rate to some foreign port. There would be still a discrimination, and they can evade this point constantly by means of shipments from Chicago or Saint Louis through to Liverpool, making one charge for all. The reason why I object to the form in which the bill leaves it is because I believe it is simply a trap that will be left to the companies to practice deception upon those who ship by their lines.

Mr. HARRISON. The section as we find it in the bill explicitly and in the very plainest language declares that any discrimination by rebate or otherwise is made illegal. Now what can any one ask more than that? I think that is the great desideratum in this question of interstate commerce—an absolute equality between shippers. This section of the bill requires it. If the Senator says that because rebates are not explicitly prohibited the section may be evaded by a rebate, I answer that it may be evaded in the original charges by giving discriminating rates; and if discriminating rates are given originally, they may be just as difficult to find out as a discrimination by rebates. This section makes it illegal to discriminate in the original rate or to effect that discrimination by paying back any of the price which has been paid. It seems to me to cover the whole ground. All that we should need to know under this section would be to find out that the rebate had been paid resulting in a discrimination, or to find out that a discrimination had been made in the original waybill or express charge for freight, and in either such case the transportation company doing the thing would be made amenable to the penalties of this law.

Mr. SLATER. But the Senator does not seem, as I understand him, to grasp the difference between the amendment as I offer it and the language of the bill. The bill is clear, so far as discrimination is concerned, if it be discrimination by drawback or rebate or other device; but if the drawback be uniform, if all are affected alike, then there is no breach of the law. That is the law to-day. If any shipper finds that he has been discriminated against, that he has been charged more than is the customary rate to other freighters, he may recover the excess with which he has been charged on showing it. Now, make drawbacks and rebates illegal in and of themselves, whether they effect a discrimination or not, and we have shut the door, if the door can be shut at all. It becomes a criminal offense then. It seems to me that the distinction is a very plain and a very broad one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 13, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask unanimous consent that so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction of bills and joint resolutions be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the Journal, which was then approved.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. DEVINE.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. Andrew Devine as one of the Official Reporters of the debates and proceedings of the House, to fill the vacancy on the corps occasioned by the death of William Blair Lord.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I send to the desk a copy of the New York Sun of yesterday, and ask the Clerk to read a short paragraph which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

LOGROLLING FOR $15,000,000—MR. RANDALL LETS DAYLIGHT IN UPON THE BIG PUBLIC-BUILDINGS JOB.

WASHINGTON, January 11.

The extraordinary logrolling scheme of members of the House for getting about fifteen millions out of the Treasury for new public buildings has received two hard blows from Mr. RANDALL in the past week, and its defeat for the session is probable. There was a sharp parliamentary tussle Saturday between Mr. STOCKSLAGER, of Indiana, and Mr. RANDALL, in which the latter came off victorious. He let daylight in upon the job in these words:

"That special order is an extraordinary one, the like of which I never saw before during my entire Congressional career. It provides that until the many bills which the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have designated, or may designate, shall be considered and disposed of, this special order may continue from day to day until all such bills on the House Calendar shall have been acted upon. It is most extraordinary in this, that it combines all these public buildings together, and provides that it shall be continuous until every single one of the public-buildings bills in the long list reported from the committee shall be disposed of."

STOCKSLAGER's motion to take up the bill got 72 votes, and 91 were cast against it. The vote was not taken by yeas and nays, so that the appropriation-seekers were not put on record. The organization of the logrollers is complete, and they still hope to drive their scheme ahead. The chances that they will catch Mr. RANDALL asleep, however, are very slim indeed.

Mr. KEIFER. I make the point that this does not present any question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no question of personal privilege involved in this matter.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Does the gentleman wish to be heard on that point?

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman wants unanimous consent to make a statement——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see in what has been read anything involving a question of personal privilege. If the gentleman desires unanimous consent to make a statement the Chair will submit the request.

Mr. RANDALL. As this matter has proceeded partially, I think it should be concluded. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] will be allowed to make a personal explanation. The Chair hears none.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, under ordinary circumstances it would be very remarkable that a great public journal like the New York Sun should have a correspondent here who would be so reckless in the statement of fact as to what transpired in the House and as to the facts connected with the public records of the House as the correspondent of the New York Sun has been in the article which has just been read in the hearing of the House. But, sir, when we consider that statements almost as reckless have been made on this floor, and when we consider further that in interviews published in the newspapers of this city with members of this House, and notably with my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], who I regret is not in his chair, who, in an interview published in the Post a few days ago, is reported to have stated that these bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds involved over $20,000,000, and who, when I called his attention to it, did not deny having made the statement, I say, Mr. Speaker, when such reckless statements are made by members of the House it is not to be wondered at that newspaper reporters should repeat them. I doubt whether they are much to blame for doing so.

Now, what are the facts as to the amount involved in the bills reported by this committee, for that is the first charge? All the bills reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in this House, taking every single one of them, including also the three which have been passed, amounting to fifty-one or fifty-two in number, I am not exactly positive, taking them all, the cost will be $6,327,400 as against the statement made in this paper of $15,000,000.

A MEMBER. But that is only the amount to begin with.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. It is less than one-half of the amount stated. It is less than one-third of the amount involved in the statement referred to as having been made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. STORM. Can the gentleman from Indiana state how much will be required to complete all these public buildings after they have been once commenced.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Yes, sir; I can say that each bill authorizing a building limits the total cost of the building proposed to be erected to the amount stated in the bill. The amount of total cost is specified in each case. And we have in addition a general law which prohibits the architect from making plans for a building which will cost more than the amount specified in the bill. If the House shall pass every single bill reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the total cost of all of them when completed will be only $6,327,400. That includes three bills already passed by the House, and it also includes $200,000 for a building for the Army Medical Museum and Library to be erected in this city.

Mr. YOUNG. And it also includes the extension of buildings which have already been commenced.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. As suggested by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG], it also includes appropriations to continue and extend buildings which have already been commenced by previous Congresses. Two million three hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars of the sum which I have mentioned is for the purpose of extending the limit of the cost of buildings already commenced.

Now, this is a moderate sum when you consider the amounts which have been appropriated by preceding Congresses.

From a digest of appropriations prepared by the Treasury Department for each fiscal year, it appears that the aggregate appropriation for public buildings and grounds during the Forty-fourth Congress was $5,731,632.78; Forty-fifth Congress, $8,037,475.97; Forty-sixth Congress, $8,252,047.17.

From Senate Executive Document No. 12, Forty-third Congress, first session, in response to a resolution of the Senate, a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury gives the aggregate amounts expended for public buildings and grounds from June 30, 1865, to June 30, 1873; from which it appears that the total expenditures, covering four Congresses, were $28,348,389.52, or an average expenditure during the Thirty-eighth, Thirty-ninth, Fortieth, and Forty-first Congresses of $7,062,097.38; the average for the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses is $7,340,384.64; the aggregate appropriations for the Forty-seventh Congress, $8,636,000.

So far as my individual judgment is concerned, I would have been in favor of limiting the number of bills and have provided for a much smaller number than has been reported by the committee. But in view of the fact that it has been three years since any bill has been passed by Congress authorizing the erection of public buildings, the committee, in its wisdom, believed that the public interests required more than I, as an individual, would have been willing to report to the House. The committee, by its own action and for the reason that I have already stated, have reported some fifty-odd bills, as against sixty-five reported in the last Congress.

Now, that is the fact as to the amount involved and as to the number of bills reported. Even if the bills passed by the Senate and now on the Speaker's table, which are not duplicates of those reported by the House, should all be passed, it would increase the amount to about eight millions and three-quarters. Then we come to the second proposition contained in the paragraph, that this is a log-rolling scheme and an extraordinary special order.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, the assertion, from whatever source it may emanate, that there is any combination, that there is any log-rolling, that there is any tying together of these bills in any conceivable way so far as it applies to me personally and individually, so far as it applies to the committee of which I have the honor of being chairman—and in my judgment so far as it applies to any individual member of that committee—is wholly gratuitous, entirely uncalled for, and utterly false. There has been nothing in the action of the committee from beginning to end which would justify any gentleman upon this floor or anywhere else in making any such assertion. If this committee had desired or intended to combine these bills, as charged by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, they would have brought them all in in one omnibus bill, as the river and harbor appropriation bill comes from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. That would have been the method if that had been the purpose they wished to accomplish. But, on the contrary, the committee studiously avoided any pretext for any charge of that kind by providing that each bill should stand upon its own merits; that each bill should stand alone, separately and apart from all the others.

Now, as to the remarkable statement that under the order these bills are to be all considered and all passed. What is the difference between this special order and other special orders, or indeed what is the difference between this special order and going into the Committeee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and taking up these bills in the ordinary way for consideration? Without the operation of the special order all bills upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House, upon which these bills are, numbering hundreds and interspersed between them, would have to be taken up and laid aside, so these bills could be reached. And in case of objection the committee would have to rise in each instance and go back into the House, and thus consume much time. This is avoided by the provision in the special order, that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds shall have power to designate the bills which shall be taken up and considered. This has been done when the committee has had a hearing, and the order in which these bills are found upon the Calendar has been strictly followed.

Second, the debate is limited to thirty minutes—fifteen minutes on each side. Does any gentleman pretend to say that that is not enough? We spent two days in the consideration of these bills and succeeded in getting through with seven of them. There were not fifteen minutes spent in the discussion of either bill upon its merits, and simply because nobody desired to occupy time in the discussion of the merits of any one proposition. I therefore infer naturally that that length of time is amply sufficient, and besides, Mr. Speaker, it should be remembered that we consider and sometimes pass, under a suspension of the rules, where only the same length of time is allowed for debate, great revenue bills—bills involving the enactment of a bankrupt law, important public measures of all kinds, and yet in all such cases only fifteen minutes on each side is allowed. Under such circumstances no amendments are admitted, while here unlimited amendments may be permitted.

But my friend says further that if this is to be done at all—that is to say, if we take up the special order—we must proceed with the consideration until all of these bills are passed. I ask, is that borne out by the facts? Is it true as a matter of fact? As I have said, we considered seven of these bills after spending two days upon them. We considered seven in Committee of the Whole House and then stopped. Now, what is there extraordinary about that? You set apart one day in each week for the Committee on Private Claims. You set apart two days in each month for business from the Committee on the District of Columbia. You set apart one night in each week for the Committee on Pensions. We do not ask anything of that kind, and the House would not have given it to us if we had asked it. What, then, is the order under which we are operating? Simply a continuing special order for a specific purpose, just such orders as are usually made; nothing more, nothing less. The House, or a majority of the House, can take up the bills, consider, and pass such of them as are meritorious and refuse to pass such as are not meritorious, as the majority may decide, and this statement will be borne out by every member who knows the facts of which I speak. The House has made such orders time and again, and it may rescind this order or may carry it out, just as it pleases. There is nothing in the order differing from continuing special orders; nothing whatever.

Now, as to the general policy of the erection of public buildings. If the House would permit a discussion of that subject I might have something to say. I may say, however, that when there is a large surplus of $200,000,000 or more in the Treasury, and when this Congress has demonstrated clearly that it will not reduce taxation, I believe that wherever the interests of the public service require public buildings to be erected it is not only sound policy but wise statesmanship to spend a reasonable portion of the money in the Treasury for their erection. Especially is this true when there are perhaps half a million of idle men walking up and down the length and breadth of this great land, and when 90 per cent. of the appropriations for these buildings go into the pockets of the laboring men. I make this remark simply as to the question of public policy.

I have already shown that there is less than seven millions covered by all of the bills which have been reported or that the House is asked to consider; and I desire to repeat that if you take up the special order the House may consider them until the majority refuse to entertain it further. The House may pass such bills as it desires and then quit. There is nothing in the order of the House to continue the consideration when it does not desire to do so.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR and Mr. TUCKER demanded the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the regular order will not be called under the circumstances.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I hope the demand will be withdrawn. My friend from Pennsylvania was kind enough to insist that I should have a hearing.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded by two gentlemen. Is the demand insisted upon?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I have no interest in the matter which has been under discussion; but I have an interest in the public business for to-day. In the interest of such business I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio insists upon the demand for the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I will proceed in some other way, that is certain.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. It will be a very remarkable spectacle if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations can not proceed.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair understands that the gentleman from Ohio insists upon the demand for the regular order.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I hope the House will not treat the gentleman from Pennsylvania ungraciously, although I think I was treated in that manner a few days ago.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to say, in the first instance, that I never had knowledge of the article, or any of the facts connected with the article in the New York Sun, until it was shown to me yesterday afternoon.

The material point in controversy between the gentleman from Indiana and myself is, and I propose to take the bull right by the horns, whether there is a combination. I do not charge, and never did, that gentlemen were guilty of forming an improper combination, but I do say that the very effect of the resolution is combination—naturally and necessarily so.

The gentleman from Indiana says that there are fifty-one of these bills. I only stated that there were thirty-one. There were four more which came in at a later period; and I am advised by what I deem to be good authority that there are ninety-six bills in all, though some of course are duplicates. I have never said or heard about the amount involved.

But a step further as to the combination. After I presented my objections, as I was entitled to do, to the consideration of this horde of bills, since I have made those objections I have been appealed to on all sides to withdraw my opposition.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Did I appeal to the gentleman?

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, no; the gentleman never spoke to me about it nor I to him. When I stated that the House I believed were unanimous in the opinion that some of these bills should be passed and that if the committee would go into conference and say what bills should be selected from this great number, then we could proceed understandingly, say as to ten or twelve or fifteen of these bills, what was the answer made to me? The answer was that the moment you go to pick out ten or twelve or fifteen of these bills the gentlemen representing the bills not selected would turn against the proposition. That is the natural effect and the necessary result coming from it.

Now, I am willing so far as the public at least are concerned to let them judge between the statements of the gentleman from Indiana and my statements in connection with this matter whether there has been necessarily a combination or not. That this is an extraordinary order hardly any fair-minded man in this House will deny. It gives in the first instance a discretion to the chairman to discriminate among these fifty-odd or sixty or seventy bills which bills shall be considered.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. That discretion is given to the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I beg pardon; it is given the committee. Next, the very words of the resolution say that this thing shall continue from day to day until the whole of these bills have been considered and disposed of.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Will my friend allow me——

Mr. RANDALL. Not now. The gentleman will keep his seat. And, further, it says a half-hour shall be occupied in the consideration and discussion of each; and then, if we are to have the yeas and nays called, it will take another half-hour. And what time would it take of this session to complete and execute this order? It would take from three to four weeks. I want to know if that is not an extraordinary proposition. And in this particular I am willing, so far as the public are concerned, that the gentleman's statements and mine shall go together as to whether it is extraordinary or not. That is all I have got to say.

Mr. TUCKER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. Just one word in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. The gentleman has referred to some matters that were not public at all.

Mr. RANDALL. I will give the gentleman my authority. He is a member of his own committee.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I give that as a reason why I want to say a single word.

Mr. TUCKER. I insist on the regular order.

REPORT OF GOVERNMENT DIRECTORS, UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, the annual report of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railway Company for the year 1884.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 12, 1885.

The message was referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

DEATH OF CADET FREDERICK S. STRANG.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy in response to resolution of the House calling for information as to the cause of the death of Cadet Frederick S. Strang, of the Naval Academy.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask that that communication be printed in the RECORD. I think we all want to read it.

Mr. MORSE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] asks unanimous consent to have this communication from the Secretary of the Navy printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MORSE. I object.

Mr. HISCOCK. We all want to see it.

Mr. MORSE. I do not want you to see it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is it in order to call for the reading of the communication?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then I call for the reading. I do not know what it is.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that he does not want us to see this communication?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects to the communication being printed in the RECORD. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] calls for its reading. That is in order.

Mr. MORSE. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have no objection to having the communication printed, provided I can make a statement of two minutes to go with it. The report is based on misstatements, as I can prove by documents. I do not think it decent to the House even to have it read here.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am willing either that it shall be read or that it shall be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. COX, of New York. I object to its being read unless I am permitted to make a statement to go with it.

Mr. ANDERSON. I believe we have a right to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so stated. The gentleman is entitled to have the communication read.

Mr. COX, of New York. It does not go into the RECORD because it is read.

The SPEAKER. That is another matter.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will consent that the communication be printed and that my colleague [Mr. COX, of New York] have two minutes—I believe that is the time he wants—and that two minutes be allowed to some gentleman on this side if it be wanted.

A MEMBER. What is the proposition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, which must be referred of course, under the rules of the House, to the appropriate committee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has demanded the reading of the communication, but withdraws the demand and asks to have the communication printed in the RECORD; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] states that he will not object to the printing in the RECORD provided he can occupy two minutes in debate.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the subject of the communication?

The SPEAKER. It is a communication from the Navy Department in relation to the death of Naval Cadet Strang at the Naval Academy.

Mr. THOMAS. I give notice that if this communication is to be printed I shall ask to occupy five minutes.

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether this is all by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. That is what is asked.

Mr. WASHBURN. Then I object.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is there objection to allowing the communication to be printed in the RECORD with the understanding that my colleague [Mr. COX] shall be allowed five minutes and some one on this side five minutes? This would only take ten minutes, and the reading would occupy that time.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to that arrangement, as the Chair understands, by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN].

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. The regular order was called for, and this communication was put in by the Speaker without the request for unanimous consent having been submitted. Can it not be withdrawn for the present?

The SPEAKER. It can be.

Mr. HAMMOND. I am very anxious that the Judiciary Committee shall get to their business, to-day having been assigned to them.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to know, as a parliamentary question, whether on the motion to refer this communication to the Committee on Naval Affairs I am not entitled to occupy five minutes?

The SPEAKER. If there were debate on the question, the gentleman, if he obtained the floor, would be entitled to one hour under the rules.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask to be heard on the question.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest this arrangement: That the communication be printed in the RECORD and that any gentleman may print in connection with it such remarks as he wishes.

Mr. THOMAS. I object to that. I do not print remarks unless I make them on the floor. I am conscientiously opposed to that. I would rather make my statement now. If the communication is to be printed, I want to make my statement to go with it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I did not understand the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. THOMAS. I say I do not desire to print any statements not made on the floor. I am ready to make my statement now if this communication is to be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. THOMAS. Five minutes.

Mr. HISCOCK. To allow five minutes on each side for debate seems to me the easiest way to dispose of the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] request permission to address the House for five minutes each on the motion to refer this communication.

Mr. TUCKER. And dispense with the reading?

The SPEAKER. And dispense with the reading; the communication to be printed in the RECORD instead of being read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The communication of the Secretary of the Navy is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 12, 1885.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the resolution of the House adopted January 7, as follows:

"Whereas it has been reported that Frederick S. Strang, late a cadet at the Naval Academy at Annapolis, has died in consequence of cruelties practiced upon him by senior cadets:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to this House any information he may have obtained in relation to the cause of death of the said Cadet Frederick S. Strang."

From information received by the Department from Capt. F. M. Ramsay, the Superintendent of the Naval Academy, it appears that Naval Cadet Frederick Schwatka Strang, of Salem, Oreg., reported at the Naval Academy for admission September 15, 1884, was examined physically September 20, and was admitted and entered September 25.

On September 27 he was placed in hospital and October 3 died there from peritonitis following an operation for the reduction of strangulated hernia. There had been doubt about the expediency of his admission on account of a predisposition to hernia, but the doubt had been resolved by the medical examiners in favor of his admission. His exercises at the first infantry drills, followed by exertion in getting out of his hammock, brought on the fatal hernia, which was judiciously and skillfully treated, although unsuccessfully.

There is no reason to believe that Cadet Strang died in consequence of cruelties practiced upon him by senior cadets, for the conclusive reason that there were no senior cadets at the academy at the time; and he had seen no cadets except his own classmates. There is no reason to believe that he experienced any ill-treatment from any of his own class or from any other person or persons, or that any such ill-treatment produced the hernia from which he died. On the contrary, the full surrounding circumstances dispel and negative any such idea and prove that the cause of the hernia was that above stated. The details, however, are not suitable for publication and should not be further explored. The unfortunate and blameless dead cadet should be allowed to rest in peace.

On October 1 the Superintendent telegraphed Mr. Thomas Strang, father of the cadet, at Salem, Oreg., that his son was very ill of strangulated hernia, and that the only hope was in an operation to be performed that morning. On the same day Mr. A. E. Strang replied from Salem, asking that his brother's exact condition should be telegraphed to him every day; and his request was complied with. Lieut. Frederick Schwatka, at 12 East Twenty-eighth street, New York city, in reply to an inquiry from him, was also informed of the cadet's condition, and went to Annapolis, arriving shortly after his death, and gave directions concerning the disposition of his remains.

Mr. A. E. Strang also sent two letters to the Superintendent, dated October 26 and November 5, the latter written after the newspaper rumors that the cadet had been injured by an encounter with senior cadets and had been rolled in a barrel; and Mr. Strang asked the "particulars concerning his illness and death, and especially the actual cause of the same."

In reply, the Superintendent, under date of November 22, gave a full account of all the circumstances of the cadet's death, showing clearly that there were no grounds for the newspaper suppositions concerning the cause; and he offered to furnish any other information which might be desired. No further inquiry, however, was made.

The resolution of inquiry to which reply is now being made was introduced into the House December 15, 1884, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

No inquiry, either in writing or oral, was made of the Navy Department concerning the subject-matter of the resolution; but on January 7, 1885, it was reported back to the House and adopted and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, accompanied by a report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, in which, in addition to the averments that Cadet Strang's death "is said to have been" the effect of "horse play," and that "his friends believe" that he was "fatally hurt" by being "put in a barrel and rolled around," are the following charges:

First. That "those interested have said that they could get no response from the authorities;"

Second. That some cases of hazing have been "simply diabolical at Annapolis, in spite of all denials to the contrary;"

Third. That there are at the academy "a great many young ruffians;"

Fourth. That there have been mock religious meetings among the cadets and that piety is ridiculed and discouraged;

Fifth. That some of the scenes at the academy are "simply horrible," that boys have "to battle with sin and vice in all its forms of hideousness;" and

Sixth. That hazing still goes on at the academy when "any man of ordinary skill and discipline might stop it."

Without intending any disrespect toward the House or any member, I deem it my imperative duty to state that in my belief there is no just foundation for such grave public condemnations of the management of the Naval Academy.

1. All inquiries concerning Cadet Strang's death have been promptly and fully answered. None have, in fact, been made, either of the Superintendent or the Department, except that of the brother, Mr. A. E. Strang, above mentioned, and that of a cousin of Mr. Strang, addressed to the surgeon of the academy, which was immediately answered.

2. There have been no "diabolical" cases of hazing. Every offense of hazing or annoying cadets that has come to the knowledge of the authorities during the past three years has been promptly punished, and thirteen cadets have been dismissed for this offense during the past two years. Complaints have been made to the Department that the authorities have dealt too severely with hazers; never that they have treated such offenders too leniently.

3. The cadets are, as a rule, orderly and well-behaved, and will compare favorably with any similar body of young men in the world. To stigmatize them as young ruffians is a gross wrong.

4. The cadets are required to attend divine service on Sundays. The chaplain is assiduous in the performance of his duties. A number of the cadets belong to a religious society which meets in the chapel every Sunday morning. The attendance is voluntary, and the chaplain states that it has been larger this year than usual.

5. To charge that sin and vice in all its forms of hideousness exists at the Naval Academy is an accusation which it seems impossible should have been made without some facts to apparently justify it. If such are within the possession of the House of Representatives I respectfully request that they may be immediately communicated to the Navy Department.

6. The Superintendent has been unremitting in his efforts to elevate the character and discipline of the academy, and has been so successful as to deserve the full approval of the Department and of Congress.

The last Board of Visitors was composed of the following: Rear-Admiral R. W. Shufeldt, General Robert C. Schenck, Senator GEORGE H. PENDLETON, Senator ANGUS CAMERON, Commissioner Dorman B. Eaton, Professor Edward S. Joynes, Representative NATHAN GOFF, jr., Representative SAMUEL S. COX, Stephen M. Allen, esq., E. S. Jouett, esq., and W. H. Upham, esq.

In their report of June 7, 1884, signed by all, they state as follows:

"The discipline of the academy seems all that could be desired and the many social privileges gained by the good conduct of the cadets is the best proof of the discipline maintained. The most remarkable illustration is the average of demerit for 1882 and 1883, as exhibited against the average to each cadet during the year just passed. The fall in demerit was as follows: The first class, from 50 demerit to 3; the second class, from 71 demerit to 38; the third class, from 94 demerit to 58; and the fourth class, from 99 demerit to 48, an improvement without a parallel in the history of the academy. The board highly commends the course of discipline adopted by the Superintendent in producing such results. The last four years the average number of demerit marks has been reduced 50 per cent. against the average number to each cadet for the preceding ten years. The board is satisfied that the cadets receive severe discipline in case of any infraction of the regulations, while accorded liberal privileges in case of good conduct."

Besides newspaper paragraphs from unknown authors, which certainly ought not to be adopted as sufficient reasons for formulating and placing upon the records of Congress charges of malfeasance against public officers, the only source known to the Department from whence could proceed so many railing accusations against the management of the Naval Academy is Mr. P. W. Moeller, principal of a young ladies' school in New York city, whose son was dismissed from the Naval Academy for hazing, and who has published a pamphlet on the subject and is persistent and malignant in his misrepresentations.

On the 27th of October, 1884, Mr. Moeller wrote to Captain Ramsay the following letter:

"NEW YORK, October 27, 1884.

"SIR: In the course of last week I forwarded to you some of our New York papers containing an article on the Naval Academy, showing you that we still remember the institution. Herewith I send you also a copy of a letter bearing on the finding of the court-martial by which my son was convicted of hazing, and whose verdict you approved of. Be assured that I shall avail myself of every opportunity to improve the school of which you are the head.

"Yours,

"P. W. MOELLER."

"Capt. F. M. RAMSAY."

On the 20th of December, 1884, Mr. Moeller wrote Captain Ramsay another letter, as follows:

"[Confidential.]

"NEW YORK, December 20, 1884.

"SIR: Yesterday I received a letter from Washington to the effect that you are opposed to an investigation in regard to Cadet Strang's death. I am sorry that I am obliged to apologize to you for the remark in my pamphlet where I say, 'The Superintendent may be a good soldier,' since you now seem to be afraid of a little questioning. Further I wish to say, so that you may not suspect anybody else, that through my exertions the case has been called up in Congress. Ever since you and your court-martial have chased my son away from the academy you have kept serenely quiet, and you may imagine how jubilant I now feel over your loquacity. My friend, Lieutenant Eaton, acted quite differently, for when he had read the pamphlet he excused himself before the class for having chased my son like a dog out of the mess-room, by saying that it had been his duty. There is a nice article on the academy in the New York Sun of the 17th instant, which I recommend to your attention. By the help of the newspapers and Congress I hope to achieve something good for your school.

"Yours,

"P. W. MOELLER.

"Capt. F. M. RAMSAY."

After Mr. Moeller's pamphlet had been published, in which he made the same accusations contained in the above letter against Lieut. J. G. Eaton, the following statement was made by that officer:

"As officer in charge last September, it was part of my duty to be present at mess formations of the cadets and preserve order in the mess-hall. After Mr. Moeller had received his dismissal and was no longer under my orders he came to dinner formation, not falling in ranks with the other cadets but loitering in the vicinity, and then entered the mess-hall and dined with the other cadets. At supper formation he was also present, not in ranks, and when he started to enter the mess-hall I called him aside and, as far as I can now remember, said to him, 'Mr. Moeller, you have now no connection with the Naval Academy; I have freely permitted you to dine with your class-mates, but I am sorry that under the regulations I can not allow you to come to supper.' I would further state that this conversation was entirely private, and that my words were kindly spoken, as I felt sorry for him."

The Superintendent also adds:

"When cadets resign or are dismissed they are always given a reasonable time in which to make preparations for their departure; as a rule they are asked how long they wish to remain."

Some method of investigation should be devised which will prevent malicious conspirators like Mr. Moeller and his associates from procuring by deception the utterance of their charges against public officials and institutions as parts of the reports of committees of Congress adopted without notice to the persons assailed or any hearing in their behalf.

Very respectfully,

W. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

The Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would not have objected to having this communication of the Secretary of the Navy spread upon the RECORD if it were not for a mistake into which he seems to have fallen after it had been thoroughly corrected. The other evening when the House was about adjourning——

Mr. HISCOCK. Do I understand that my colleague is to have five minutes, and that then five minutes are to be allowed to some gentleman on this side?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. HISCOCK. Which he is to divide, I understand, with the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. THOMAS. I will arrange that. I will yield a part of my time.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is a member here who would not for humane as well as other motives stop this pernicious practice of hazing at Annapolis.

A MEMBER. Or hazing anywhere else.

Mr. COX, of New York. Or anywhere else. Our committee reported back this resolution. Thereupon I made my statement. I said that I had certain letters; some from the parents of those who had been more or less associated with this academy. These letters gave information. Upon this I predicated the resolution.

The other evening when I reported it back to the House as a question of privilege I asked that I might have "a statement" printed. It was not a report of the committee. I asked that the "committee's report," which was the resolution only, might be adopted; and afterward I also said that I had a statement which would go with it. If there was any error in the RECORD to mislead the honorable Secretary it was not of much consequence, as a reading of the RECORD shows what my "statement" really was. But I took pains to correct the error into which the Secretary had fallen.

By some little mistake of the printer, in a hurried moment the word "report" was inserted instead of "statement." The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. GEORGE] followed by saying:

I wish also to make a statement on this subject to go into the RECORD.

Thus our "statements" went into the RECORD. Thereupon the Secretary of the Navy, on the 8th of January, writes me this letter:

There is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 8, 1885, in connection with the resolution of inquiry concerning the death of Naval Cadet Frederick S. Strang, a paper of which you are reported as saying, as follows:

"I ask by unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs on this subject, as it contains a statement of the facts."

This paper, which I can hardly believe is a deliberate report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, contains many extraordinary statements and charges concerning the Naval Academy.

It will thus be seen that the Secretary desired the letters upon which my statements were predicated. This was adroit. I declined the invitation; and on the 9th of January—three days before he makes the report now submitted—I wrote him a letter, in which I corrected his assumption that my statements had the dignity and importance of a report. This is the letter:

You have evidently misunderstood the matter. It was not a report of the committee, except in so far as the resolution as to Strang was a report. The matter in which you seem to be interested was simply a statement of mine, as will be seen by reading it, for which I am responsible individually. When you say that you can hardly believe it a deliberate report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, you make rather peculiar language. There are no statements which are extraordinary that are not placed under proper conditions. I have a great many statements, upon which my statement was made. You shall have them at the proper time. I would like very much to see your answer to the resolution, and I will see whether it is worth while to go on with the business. I will send some gentlemen who are interested in this hazing business to you, if they come along.

This letter was sent to the Secretary. If he never received it my remarks will lose much of their cogency. But is it not strange that three days after I thus told the Secretary that my statement was no report of the committee, he sends us this answer in which he perversely insists all the way through that it is the report of the committee, and this after knowing to the contrary?

This report is intended in great part as an arraignment of the committee, if not of Congress, for their presumption in not first consulting the honorable Secretary, and, secondly, in not believing that the institution is absolutely immaculate.

The criticism I make on this report is that it pretends—

First. To criticise a member's remarks as a report of a committee when he knew the statement to be otherwise than such report. Hence it does not deserve much courtesy.

Second. That he assumes that certain references and quotations from a newspaper, the Hartford Courant (General HAWLEY'S journal), in my remarks, were made by the committee.

The third and fourth specifications, which the honorable Secretary himself makes in his own way, were not in my remarks except as quotations. The expression "great many young ruffians" is from the newspaper. The statement as to the mock religious meetings, &c., where piety was ridiculed, was from the same source, as changed by the Secretary somewhat.

I desire, also, liberty to state, in response to the elaborate remarks of the honorable Secretary, as to a Mr. Moeller, that, so far as I know, he did not instigate the resolution. I do not know him. The papers upon which the resolution of inquiry was founded were sent to me by an excellent citizen of German descent—an ex-member of Congress. Whatever claim this gentleman, Mr. Moeller, may present as the author of this investigation in the future may redound to his credit. Any remarks on his motives are neither responsive to the resolution of inquiry nor proper to be considered in connection with the discipline and value of the academy.

It is my impression, sir, that all inquiries of the Department or academy as to the death of young Strang were not fully answered, if answered at all. But if they were, it does not follow that Congress should not make inquiry in a matter concerning one of our own institutions.

In other respects the honorable Secretary undertakes to do something more than respond to the resolution; but, as in all such cases, there is sure to be discrepancies, if not confession. In one of his statements he says that there is "no just foundation for such grave public condemnation" of the academy such as he had rehearsed, including hazing; and he further says, on the same page, that there have been no "diabolical cases of hazing;" and then confesses "that every offense of hazing or annoying cadets that has come to the knowledge of the authorities during the past three years has been promptly punished, and thirteen cadets have been dismissed for this offense during the past two years."

Gentlemen will thus see that I made all my statements conditional as to the truth of the allegations. I refrained from assuming that the statements were true. They were statements on which to found an investigation as to their truth. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I can not throw any reproach on the academy, unless to improve the institution by closer scrutiny.

We have heard and I believe that cadets have been compelled to eat soap, to drink ink, suffer indignities of many kinds, and even compelled to mock at their religion. No one has been able to stop it altogether. It should be stopped absolutely. I think any man of skill, firmness, and discipline might stop it.

The other day we noticed in the public prints that a cadet was dismissed for getting drunk in this city and attempting to shoot another cadet. I think that occurrence or the dismissal was after my resolution of inquiry came to the House. Perhaps we have done some good. Let us prosecute the inquiry until we succeed in getting at the facts and getting rid of the evils of hazing. Thus we may make the Naval Academy an institution fit in its highest sense for the education of our ambitious young men.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GOFF rose.

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield to the gentleman from West Virginia for two minutes and a half.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, the committee, or at least this member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, desires it understood that the report or statement, call it what you please, made by the chairman of the committee, so far as it is considered by any one to be a statement of the facts in the Strang case, was not so reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs. It seems to me, in justice to the Secretary of the Navy, that the statement now made by the chairman of that committee, if it had been made in open House at or after the time he wrote the Secretary, as stated by him, and made part of the RECORD, why then it would have obviated that portion of the reply of the Secretary of the Navy to which the gentleman from New York takes exception. I call the attention of the House to this language, as reported on page 605 of the RECORD:

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs on this subject, as it contains a statement of the facts.

Then follows the statement which the Secretary of the Navy explains and alludes to in the reply now laid before us, and which the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs now states was not intended as a report but as his individual statement. I say it necessarily followed, when it was so printed in the RECORD, that which the distinguished chairman of the committee now states he intended as his personal language, it did and has gone before the country as the statement of the Committee on Naval Affairs and as a statement of facts when it was not so intended by the committee nor its chairman.

Mr. COX, of New York. I wrote to the Secretary three days before that it was my personal language.

Mr. GOFF. That was a private letter to the Secretary and did not go before the country.

Mr. COX, of New York. But the Secretary knew it.

Mr. GOFF. But the RECORD was not corrected, and has gone to the country that these diabolical acts have been committed at the Naval Academy, when in fact the committee has made no such report as my friend has stated.

Mr. COX, of New York. The RECORD shows that it was only my personal statement.

Mr. GOFF. I have only two and a half minutes.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will not interrupt you further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's two and a half minutes have expired.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I regret that so little time is allowed, and I specially regret that I am not able to yield further to the gentleman from West Virginia, my colleague on the Committee on Naval Affairs. I only demanded a hearing in order that the facts in this case might come out in connection with the Secretary's letter or report, which is based upon a false hypothesis.

The resolution reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs and adopted by the House of Representatives was considered by the committee. It was adopted by the House in conformity with the recommendations of the Committee on Naval Affairs. The statement which follows, and which purports in the RECORD to be a report from the Committee on Naval Affairs, is, as the chairman has stated, an error.

As to whether these charges are true or false I can not say, as they have never been investigated by the committee at all. There were certain facts brought to the attention of the committee by the chairman which justified us, we thought at the time, in reporting a resolution of inquiry, and it was accordingly done.

In order that I may be placed right as a member of the committee, and straight before the House and the world, I make this statement: This was not the report of the committee, and our chairman, recognizing that it was a misprint, very frankly stated to the Secretary in his letter of the 8th instant, as well as to the committee, that it was an error; that it was a statement of his own, for which he was himself responsible.

The question has never been considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs as to whether the statements in this statement are true or false. As I have said before, there was nothing before us to justify us in making any such report. I hope, with the chairman, upon the representations we have before us, that this House will not hesitate to probe this matter to its very depths, and that the sunlight of truth may shine in upon it; for I am as convinced as I am that I live that hazing goes on in that institution in every imaginable degree—from the mildest type to what may be denominated simply as diabolical. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TUCKER. I now call up the regular order.

Mr. WASHBURN. I will inquire if this resolution is to be printed in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. It will be printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Does the gentleman from Virginia call for the regular order or the special order?

Mr. TUCKER. I call for the special order assigning this day to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE, January 7, 1875.

Resolved, That Tuesday, January 13, be assigned to the Committee on the Judiciary for the consideration of such business as may be presented by said committee; this order not to interfere with the consideration of general appropriation and revenue bills, and the special order adopted January 21 last, relating to reports from the Committee on Public Lands; and in case this order shall be interfered with on that day, it shall be continued in force until one day thereafter has been occupied by the Committee on the Judiciary.

A. B. MONTGOMERY.

Mr. TUCKER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, the first bill which the Committee on the Judiciary presents is the bill (H. R. 7584) for the relief of A. B. Montgomery.

The SPEAKER. That bill is in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HAMMOND. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be considered in the House at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7584) for the relief of A. B. Montgomery.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I make the point of order that the first business in order under this special order of the House is the unfinished business of the Committee on the Judiciary coming over from a former day, which is also the first bill on the House Calendar. That bill has been under consideration in the House. It is the bill relating to the redistricting of the State of Missouri, or the dividing of the districts of the State into several divisions.

The SPEAKER. The bill to which the gentleman from Missouri refers was left as unfinished business at the close of the business to which it belonged—that is, the business on the House Calendar. But on the 7th day of this month the House, on motion of the gentleman from Virginia, made the special order which has just been read, an order which provides that this day, January 13, shall be assigned to the Committee on the Judiciary for the consideration of such business as may be presented by said committee, thereby changing the regular order of business in the House by placing it in the power of the committee to indicate such bills as it chooses to call up.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact, however, that when the bill in question was under consideration before the House it was under a special order similar to the one now in operation, and was called up by the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill was being considered by the House when we adjourned on that day, and was left as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. That was an order fixing a certain specified day for the consideration of such business as the Committee on the Judiciary might choose to present, but did not extend beyond that day.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Yes; similar to the order under which the committee now calls up the bill before us.

The SPEAKER. The committee presented that bill at the time referred to by the gentleman from Missouri under the order then being executed. But it will be observed that that order simply fixed a particular day for the consideration of bills reported from that committee, and did not continue from day to day, or to another day, it not being a continuing order. Of course, when that day expired all such business expired with it; and the House has now made a new order giving the control of this day to the Committee on the Judiciary for the presentation of such business as it may choose to present. That has been the ruling of the Chair heretofore on similar occasions, and the Chair sees no reason to modify it now.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. In connection with the present order, then, I desire to state that several of my colleagues and myself have been under the impression clearly that this bill, the unfinished business, and the first bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, as well as the first bill on the House Calendar, would be first called up by the committee to-day under this special order. We have so understood the special order. It was so understood by us when it passed the House by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That all political disabilities imposed upon A. B. Montgomery, a citizen of Georgia, by the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Private Calendar, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

WILLIAM GARDNER.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7585) for the relief of William Gardner, and put the same upon its passage.

The bill was read, and is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembld (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That all political disabilities imposed upon William M. Gardner, a citizen of the State of Georgia, by the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill for the relief of William M. Gardner."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill which has just been read?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMMOND. Before this bill is ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, I wish to state that the committee are not certain as to the name being "William." The initials are "W. M.," and therefore I move to amend the bill by striking out the word "William" and inserting "W.;" so that it will read "W. M. Gardner."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

The title was amended to conform to the text of the bill.

REMOVAL OF ACTIONS IN STATE COURTS.

Mr. HAMMOND. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to call up the bill (H. R. 4409) to amend section 643 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 643 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by inserting therein after the word "void," in the fourth sentence thereof, the following:

"Provided, however, That when any criminal prosecution shall be removed from a State court to a United States court before a presentment by a grand jury or indictment shall have been made and filed against the defendants in the State court, it shall be lawful for the State court to proceed in such case so far as to have such presentment or indictment made and filed in said State court; and after the same is so made and filed the clerk of the United States court shall issue a writ of certiorari to the State court for like purposes and with like effect as if the case had been so removed after such presentment or indictment was made and filed in such State court."

Mr. HAMMOND. I call for the reading of the report.

The Clerk commenced to read the report.

Mr. HAMMOND. It has been suggested that perhaps the reading of the report is unnecessary, and I do not wish to consume time. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD as the reason for the unanimous recommendation of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Is the report unanimous?

Mr. HAMMOND. It is the unanimous report of the whole committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had the subject under consideration, submit the following report:

Section 643 of the Revised Statutes of the United States has for its basis the act of March 2, 1833, "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports" (U. S. Stat., vol. 4, p. 632). It provided for the removal of actions in State courts against revenue officers on petition, &c., of defendant to circuit court. It declared that when the required proceedings had been had by filing affidavit, &c., "thereupon it shall be the duty of the said State court to stay all further proceedings in such cause, and the said suit or prosecution, upon delivery of such process (from the United States court) or leaving the same as aforesaid, shall be deemed and taken to be removed to the said circuit court, and any further proceedings, trial, or judgment therein in the State court shall be wholly null and void."

By acts of July 13, 1866 (U. S. Stat., vol. 14, p. 171), February 28, 1871 (U. S. Stat., vol. 16, p. 438), and March 3, 1875 (U. S. Stat., vol. 18, p. 401), the act was so amended that the law now covers "removal of suits and prosecutions against revenue officers and officers acting under registration laws."

The language of the act of 1833 above quoted is still the language of section 643. The bill under consideration proposes after said sentence to add these words:

"Provided, however, That when any criminal prosecution shall be removed from a State court to a United States court before a presentment by a grand jury or indictment shall have been made and filed against the defendants in the State court, it shall be lawful for the State courts to proceed in such case so far as to have such presentment or indictment made and filed in said State; and after the same is so made and filed the clerk of the United States court shall issue a writ of certiorari to the State court for like purposes and with like effect as if the case had been so removed after such presentment or indictment was made and filed in such State court."

The judges of the United States courts have differed as to the construction of the clause of the act of 1833, and section 643, above quoted. Some have held that no removal could be had under the same until there was a case made by presentment or indictment and its filing in the office of clerk of a court of record, upon whom service could be made, and who could certify and send up such record.

On the other hand, it has been held that a removal may be had when naught had been done by the State authorities except the issuance of a warrant for arrest by some committing magistrate. In many States these magistrates have no clerk, and keep no record.

If that trouble be out of the way when a removal occurs at that stage of affairs, the State courts are enjoined from further proceedings, and the case is between the two jurisdictions suspended.

Who shall draw the indictment in the United States court? The United States attorney then is, by the statute, made the defendants' counsel. Can the grand jury of the United States court find a presentment or true bill for a State offense? That would seem to require express grant of authority, at least.

If the United States grand jury can so act it is more expensive to take witnesses to them than to the courts of the State and county in which the crime is alleged to have been committed, and let them determine whether the defendants should be put upon trial. Without deciding which of the two constructions of the act is correct, it seeming sufficient that the offered protection of the United States should attach only after formal and more serious charge of a crime, we recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAMMOND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. PEMBROKE JONES.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. 7963) to remove the political disabilities of J. Pembroke Jones, of Virginia; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. (two-thirds of each House concurring), That the political disabilities of J. Pembroke Jones, of Virginia, incurred under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

CALIFORNIA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. TUCKER. I call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 1808) to detach certain counties from the United States judicial district of California, and create the United States judicial district of Southern California; and yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD] who reported the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all that portion of the State of California now comprised in the counties of San Diego, Los Angeles, San Bernardino, Ventura, San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara, and Kern is hereby detached from the United States judicial district of California and made a separate judicial district, called the United States judicial district of Southern California.

SEC. 3. That the district of California shall hereafter consist of all of the counties of said State not named in this act, and shall hereafter be called the district of Northern California; and the circuit and district courts shall be held therein as follows: Beginning on the first Monday in April, the second Monday in August, and the first Monday of December in each year, at San Francisco.

SEC. 4. That the circuit or district court for either of said districts may, in its discretion, order special terms, and order a grand or petit jury, or both, to attend the same, by an order to be entered of record twenty days before the day at which said special term shall be ordered to convene; and said courts, respectively, at such special terms shall have all the powers that they have at a regular term appointed by law: Provided, however, That no special term of said circuit court for either district shall be appointed except by and with the concurrence and consent of the circuit judge.

SEC. 5. That all suits and other proceedings of every kind and nature now pending in the circuit or district court of the United States for the district of California shall be tried and disposed of in the circuit and district courts, respectively, for said district of Northern California as the same would have been if this act had not been passed, and for that purpose jurisdiction is reserved to said courts in the said district of Northern California; and the clerks of the circuit and district courts of the present district of California shall retain the records and files of said courts at the city of San Francisco, and do and perform all the duties appertaining to the said offices, respectively, within said northern district, except as hereinafter provided; and all process returnable to or proceedings noticed for any term of the present circuit or district court of California shall be deemed returnable to the next term of said courts, respectively, in the said northern district as fixed by this act.

SEC. 6. That upon application of any party to any suit or proceeding now pending in the present circuit or district court of the present district of California which would have been commenced in the proper court for the district of Southern California if this act had been in force at the time of the commencement thereof, the proper court shall order that the same be removed for further proceedings to the proper court for said southern district; and thereupon the clerk shall transmit certified copies of all the papers and of all orders made therein to the clerk of the court to which such suit or proceeding shall be removed, and all other proceedings shall be had in said court to which the same shall be removed, as if said suit or proceeding had originally been commenced therein.

SEC. 7. That the passage of this act shall not have the effect to destroy or impair the lien of any judgment or decree rendered in the circuit or district court of the United States for the present district of California prior to this act taking effect; and final process on any judgment or decree entered in the circuit or district court of the United States for the district of California, or which shall be entered therein prior to this act taking effect, and all other process for the enforcement of any order of said courts, respectively, in any cause or proceeding now pending therein, except causes or proceedings removed as herein provided, shall be issued and made returnable to the proper court for the said district of Northern California, and may be directed to and executed by the marshal of the United States for the said northern district in any part of the State of California.

SEC. 8. That there shall be appointed a district judge for said district of Southern California, who shall reside therein, and who shall receive an annual salary of $5,000, payable quarterly from the Treasury; and there shall also be appointed a marshal and a district attorney of the United States for said district of Southern California, who shall respectively receive such fees and compensation and exercise such powers and duties as are now fixed and enjoined by law.

SEC. 9. That the circuit and district judges of said district of Southern California shall appoint two clerks, each of whom shall be clerks of both the circuit and district courts for said southern district, who shall reside and keep their office at Los Angeles, in said district, and who shall receive such fees and compensation for services performed by them, respectively, as are now fixed by law.

SEC. 10. That either of the clerks of the circuit and district courts for said district of Southern California is hereby authorized, under the direction of the district judge of said southern district, to make transcripts of any of the records, files, or papers of the district and circuit courts of the United States remaining in the office of the clerks of the present district of California, and of all matters and proceedings which relate to or concern liens upon or titles to real estate situated in said southern district, and for that purpose shall have access to said records in the office of said clerks in the district of California; and such transcripts, when so made by either of said clerks, shall be certified to be true and correct by the clerk making the same, and the same, when so made and certified, shall be evidence in all courts and places equally with said originals.

SEC. 11. That nothing in this act shall in any manner affect the tenure of office of the judge, marshal, district attorney, or other officers of the present district of California, who shall respectively be entitled to the same salaries, fees, and emoluments now received by them.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2 as follows: Strike out the words "circuit and" where they occur in the first line of said section and add the following at the end of said section:

"And the regular terms of the circuit court for said district of Southern California shall be held at Los Angeles, beginning on the first Monday of May, the second Monday of July, and the first Monday of November of each year."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I offer also another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 3 as follows: Strike out the words "circuit and" in the fourth line of said section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I propose also another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following section:

"This act shall take effect on the 1st day of June, A. D. 1885."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROADHEAD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SECURITY IN WRITS OF ERROR.

Mr. TUCKER. I call up the bill (H. R. 3714) and yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER].

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3714) to amend section 1000 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 1000 of the Revised Statutes of the United States of America be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1000. Every justice or judge signing a citation on any writ of error shall, except in cases brought up by the United States, or by direction of any Department of the Government, take good and sufficient security that the plaintiff in error or the appellant shall prosecute his writ or appeal to effect, and, if he fail to make his plea good, shall answer all damages and costs where the writ is a supersedeas and stays execution, or all costs only where it is not a supersedeas as aforesaid. But the security shall not be approved by any such justice or judge except upon reasonable notice to the adverse party, nor until the sureties thereon, if excepted to, have justified in such manner as the rules of the court shall provide, or if no provision therefor is made by such rules, as the justice or judge may direct."

The committee recommended the following amendment:

In line 16, after the words "adverse party," insert the words "or his attorney."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DORSHEIMER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENERAL INCORPORATION ACTS OF TERRITORIES.

Mr. TUCKER. I call up the bill (H. R. 3058) and yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY].

Mr. SENEY. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to call up the bill (H. R. 3058) to amend section 1889 of chapter 1, title 23, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to general incorporation acts of Territories.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 1889 of chapter 1, title 23, of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1889. The Legislative Assemblies of the several Territories shall not grant private charters or special privileges, but they may, by general incorporation acts, permit persons to associate themselves together as bodies corporate for mining, manufacturing, or other industrial pursuits, or the construction and operation of railroads, wagon-roads, canals, or irrigating-ditches, and the colonization and improvement of lands in connection therewith, or for colleges, seminaries, churches, libraries, or any benevolent, charitable, or scientific association."

Mr. MAGINNIS. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that the word "banking" should be inserted.

Mr. SENEY. The gentleman can offer that as an amendment.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I ask the Clerk to read my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10, after the word "mining," insert the word "banking."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SENEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TERMS OF COURT IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. TUCKER. I call up the bill (H. R. 6076) and yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I call up the bill (H. R. 6076) to authorize terms of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of the State of North Carolina, at the city of Wilmington, in said district.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That terms of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern judicial district of the State of North Carolina shall be held at the city of Wilmington, in said district, at the times now fixed by law for holding the terms of the district court of the United States at said place.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FEES OF CLERKS UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I call up House bill No. 2576, reported by the committee with an amendment, being a bill to repeal section 840 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The Clerk read the bill as proposed to be amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section No. 840 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That so much of section 839 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as is contained in the words "except as provided in the next section," in lines 2 and 3 of said section, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. In order to explain the object of this bill, I call for the reading of the very brief report which accompanies it.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR), as follows:

That section 840 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, sought to be repealed by this bill, was enacted in 1853, and provided that the clerks of the several circuit and district courts in California, Oregon, and Nevada should be entitled to charge and receive double the fees allowed to clerks by general law, not to exceed $7,000 per year.

While your committee are aware that reasons may have existed formerly for the passage and continuance of this law, they are of the opinion that they are no longer operative, and that said section ought to be repealed.

The repeal of section 840 requires a modification of section 839 of the Revised Statutes by striking out the words "except as provided in the next section," in lines 2 and 3 of said section 839, and therefore they report an amendment to that effect.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill so amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair). The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee, which is the second section of the bill as reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I move to amend the title by adding the words "and a portion of section 839."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIMITATION OF TIME FOR PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS.

Mr. TUCKER. I call up House bill No. 5849, limiting the time for the presentation and payment of claims against the United States.

The bill has been reported with amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all claims for back pay or bounty due to officers, soldiers, or to any other person, for services in the late civil war, or any previous war, shall be presented to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, or other proper tribunal, for adjustment or payment, within two years after the passage of this act, and all other existing claims against the United States, excepting claims for pension, shall be presented within six years from the passage of this act; and all claims against the United States originating hereafter shall be presented, within six years from the time they originate, to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, or other proper tribunal, for settlement and payment. No claim shall be acted upon or paid unless presented within the time herein named. In computing the years of limitation herein fixed no time shall be included when the person entitled to present the claim shall be a lunatic, a minor, or under any other legal disability: Provided, That the claims herein mentioned shall not be construed to include the accounts of paymasters or disbursing officers, or other persons disbursing money or accountable to the United States for property.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 7, strike out "two" and insert "three."

Mr. KEIFER. I do not rise to discuss this bill, but simply to make an inquiry as to what is to be its effect—whether it is to revive claims of any kind which are already barred by the statute of limitations.

Mr. TUCKER. I do not think it will have that effect. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that the bill was drawn by an eminent officer of the Treasury Department upon the suggestion that it would give important aid in disposing of a large number of claims. The purpose of the bill is to make a limitation upon the officers of the Department. The bill makes the limit three years in certain cases and in other cases six years, and, according to the view of the gentleman who drew the bill, it will have no such effect as that feared by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. No doubt the gentlemen of the committee have looked into this question; but I think it is very important that we should not enact any law which will revive claims already barred. We all know that there is a large class of cases that have been barred for years by the statute of limitations, although I am not able to describe or specify them distinctly at this moment.

Mr. MOULTON. This bill removes no limitation whatever.

Mr. KEIFER. Then ought there not to be a provision in the bill, in clear and precise language, to the effect that nothing herein contained shall revive any claims that are now barred by the statute of limitations? I wish that such a provision could be inserted in the bill before it is passed.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Virginia, and the bill has been drawn with reference to the facts that I am about to state. Under legislation heretofore enacted the Treasury Department has been authorized to audit claims up to a certain period of time, where there were unexpended balances of appropriations to pay those claims which had been covered into the Treasury. That period of time has expired, unless it has been extended by some legislation of which I am unaware. The question then is whether the effect of this bill will not be to give the auditing officers power to pass upon and audit bills or claims as to which they have no such power to-day? The gentleman from Virginia must remember that in the Forty-fifth Congress, I think, a bill was passed, or an amendment was adopted upon an appropriation bill, which continued up to a certain period of time the power to audit claims for the payment of which unexpended balances had been covered into the Treasury, and I think that a subsequent Congress extended the time.

Mr. KEIFER. Is not the gentleman mistaken?

Mr. HISCOCK. The power was to audit claims, and those claims were to be reported to Congress. None of them can be paid by the Treasury Department, the unexpended balances having been covered into the Treasury. I am not mistaken about it.

Mr. TUCKER. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that this act in its terms covers any cases of that character. I do not think it would cover any application to Congress, but only applications to the Department. Claims heretofore presented do not come within the terms of this act. It provides that "all claims against the United States originating hereafter shall be presented within six years from the time they originate to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, or other proper tribunal, for settlement and payment."

Mr. KEIFER. Then, according to the statement of the gentleman from Virginia, this is to open the Department for the presentation of claims that have not been presented, and that have been barred from presentation long ago. That, I presume, is not the intention of the draughtsman of this bill or of the committee, and I am only seeking to have a provision put in the bill that will prevent the opening up of those old claims, many of which have not been presented. I do not understand, of course, that this bill undertakes to fix any limitation upon the Congress of the United States, for I have time and again denied that one Congress can by law fix a limitation against the presentation of claims to a succeeding Congress. In other words, I have held that the right of petition which is given by the Constitution to every citizen continues from Congress to Congress, and that each Congress as it assembles has the right, within the limits of the Constitution, to grant whatever relief it pleases.

Mr. TUCKER. Would it meet the objection of the gentleman if we should insert the words: "And all other existing claims not already barred?"

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; that would cover my main objection, I think.

Mr. TUCKER. I have no objection to making that amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I would prefer, however, that it should be put in such a form as to provide that this act shall not have the effect to revive any claims now barred by the statute of limitations.

Mr. HISCOCK. But the point that I make—and I believe I am right in it—is this: that there is now no warrant for the auditing of any claims whatever of the character indicated by this bill, unless they have been already presented to Congress.

Mr. POLAND. This does not give any such right.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg your pardon. This bill will probably be construed to mean that claims can be presented at any time within three years. I desire a distinct understanding on the part of the committee as to the effect of the bill. The period of time within which those claims could be presented has already expired, and the point I desire to call to the gentleman's attention is that this bill which he presses here will have the effect to extend that period.

Mr. TUCKER. The amendment which I have suggested meets that point.

Mr. HISCOCK. The question is whether you want to give claimants that chance.

Mr. TUCKER. We do not. I send to the Clerk's desk a proviso which I offer by way of amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Virginia will appreciate the point I make, that the period has expired within which any of these claims can be presented——

Mr. LONG. What claims?

Mr. HISCOCK. Claims for bounty and back pay, and claims of that class; and that this bill revives them.

Mr. MOULTON. I do not think the bill admits of any such construction; but the amendment which the gentleman from Virginia has just sent up will obviate that difficulty at any rate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to revive any claim now barred by the statute of limitations."

Mr. KEIFER. I certainly have no objection to that.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia this question: If it is true that these claims are barred to-day, do you wish to revive the right to present them to the Department?

Mr. TUCKER. Of course if they are barred to-day this proviso will prevent their being revived.

Mr. HISCOCK. They are not barred by any statute of limitations, but the power of the Treasury Department to receive and audit them has expired.

Mr. TUCKER. If the Department has no power to audit the claims, of course the question is coram non judice.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now some claims of this character were audited and allowed by the First Comptroller; but under section 4 of the act of 1878 there is now no power of the Department to receive and audit such claims. In my opinion, the effect of this bill will be to give the Department power to receive and audit them.

Mr. POLAND. The proviso cuts that off.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have sent for the act of 1878, and will read it in a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] to come in as a proviso at the end of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a class of claims from the Quartermaster's Department which will be covered by this bill—claims of a character which have heretofore been allowed by the Second Comptroller. Under section 4 of the act approved June 14, 1878, the time has expired within which these claims can be received and audited. We are now asked to extend that time.

Mr. POLAND. Not at all. This proviso cuts them off.

Mr. HISCOCK. I read section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878:

That so much of section 5 of the act approved June 20, 1874, as directs the Secretary of the Treasury at the beginning of each session to report to Congress with his annual estimates any balances of appropriations for specific objects affected by said section that may need to be reappropriated, be, and hereby is, repealed. And it shall be the duty of the several accounting officers of the Treasury to continue to receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of all claims under appropriations, the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of said section, that may be brought before them within a period of five years. And the Secretary of the Treasury will report the amount due each claimant at the commencement of each session, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall lay the same before Congress for consideration: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the re-examination and payment of any claim or account which has once been examined and rejected unless reopened in accordance with existing law.

Now, the point I make is that this bill will extend the period which has expired for the presentation of these claims. A gentleman asks me why the proposition submitted, upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, does not meet this point? That is merely a limitation of the right of action; but we are not dealing with claims which can be sued upon. This is a mere question of audit.

Mr. TUCKER. The statute of limitations applies to auditing.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Now, the provision I have just read covers claims contemplated by this bill. The bill provides that—

All claims for back pay or bounty due to officers, soldiers, or to other persons for services in the late civil war or any previous war shall be presented to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department or other proper tribunal for adjustment and payment within two years after the passage of this act.

Now, I say the period of five years originally allowed having expired, you propose to extend it for two, or, as the amendment of the committee proposes, three years. I want the House to know precisely what it is doing. The gentleman from Virginia has now added to the bill a proviso to the effect that nothing in this act shall revive any claim now barred under existing law. This proviso refers to the bar of the statute of limitations. But the question is as to the right of presentation and auditing at the Department, and it will be found that under this bill parties will continue to bring in such claims as those to which I have referred. I wish to have it distinctly understood what is being done. I really thought the gentleman from Virginia was not aware of the section of the statutes which I have read. My friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] understands this question fully, I have no doubt.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not understand this section 4 which has been read by the gentleman from New York contains any limitation at all. The first part provides that so much of section 5 of the act approved June 30, 1874, as directs the Secretary of the Treasury at the beginning of each session of Congress to report with his annual estimates any balances of appropriations for specific objects affected by said section which may need to be appropriated be, and is hereby, repealed. That is the first clause of the section. It simply provides that this shall not be any longer in the annual report of the officer. It then proceeds: "And it shall be the duty of the several accounting officers of the Treasury to continue to receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of the claims under appropriations, the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of said section as may be brought before them within a period of five years." The second clause simply provides——

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me say to the gentleman from Indiana, if he appreciates my point it is this: That five years has expired. This bill extends it two years more.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Now, the five years only applies to this character of claims. It only applies to the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to continue to receive, examine, and consider certain claims under appropriations which have been exhausted.

Mr. HISCOCK. Well, go on.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund, under the provision of said section, as may be brought before them within the period of five years.

Mr. HISCOCK. What I say is this, that the claims indicated in this bill are covered by that description, every one of them.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not so understand it. It does nothing more than prescribe the time within which the Secretary of the Treasury may perform with reference to a certain specific class of claims a certain duty; that is all. It does not prohibit the payment subsequently to five years of a claim against the United States. It contains no limitation whatever against the liability of the Government for the payment of this class of claims, but it does limit the time within which the Secretary of the Treasury may perform with reference to them a particular duty.

Mr. HISCOCK. I think you will find a further fact in reference to this, that Secretary Folger made a report to Congress in which he recommended that this extension should be made for twelve months. This bill makes it for a much longer period of time. In the report which he submitted he indicated the language to be employed. I believe he submitted the provision himself, and he surrounded it with every safeguard and restriction. That provision was put on the deficiency bill by the Appropriations Committee, but it was stricken off in the Senate, they refusing to extend it at all. The present Secretary, Mr. McCulloch, you will find in his report in reference to that recommendation of his predecessor, approves of it, but he does not go to the extent of this bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JACKSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill as amended was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN RESERVATION IN YELLOWSTONE PARK.

Mr. TUCKER called up from the House Calendar a bill (H. R. 6404) to authorize the service of civil and criminal process issued by Territorial courts within military and Indian reservations and the Yellowstone National Park.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions of the laws now in force relating to the Territorial courts of any of the United States Territories shall be so construed as to authorize the execution and service of any process, civil or criminal, issued out of or by any of said courts, by the officer or person to whom the same may be addressed, within any military or Indian reservation or within the Yellowstone National Park: Provided, That such reservation or park is situated within the exterior limits or bounds of the county or district over which said court has jurisdiction; and when said process, civil or criminal, is executed or served, it shall be with like effect as though such reservation or park was a part of the county or district within which such process is served.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPEALS FROM SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. POLAND called up from the House Calendar a bill (H. R. 6220) regulating appeals from the supreme court of the District of Columbia and the supreme courts of the several Territories.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no appeal or writ of error shall hereafter be allowed from any judgment or decree in any suit at law or in equity in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or in the supreme court of any of the Territories of the United States, unless the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, shall exceed the sum of $5,000.

SEC. 2. That the preceding section shall not apply to any case wherein is involved the validity of any patent or copyright, or in which is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of or an authority exercised under the United States, but in all such cases an appeal or writ of error may be brought without regard to the sum or value in dispute.

Mr. POLAND. I call for the reading of the report accompanying that bill.

The report (by Mr. POLAND) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6220) to regulate appeals from the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and from the supreme courts of the several Territories, have considered the same and recommend the passage of the same.

The committee deem it advisable to state the existing condition of the statutes governing appeals from said courts to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Appeals and writs of error are now allowed from the supreme court of the District of Columbia in cases where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum of $2,500. (20 Statutes at Large, 320.)

From the final decisions of the supreme court of the Territory of Washington appeals and writs of error are allowed when the amount in controversy exceeds the sum of $2,000. (Revised Statutes, section 702.)

From the final decision of the supreme court in each of the other Territories an appeal or writ of error lies when the amount in controversy exceeds $1,000. (Revised Statutes, section 702.)

All cases involving the validity of patent rights or copyrights in any of said courts may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States without regard to the amount involved. (Revised Statutes, section 699.)

Any judgment or decree of the supreme court of the Territory of Washington, wherein the "Constitution, or a statute, or treaty of the United States is brought in question," may be reviewed by appeal or writ of error. (Revised Statutes, section 702.)

This provision does not apply to the courts of the other Territories or of the District of Columbia.

No case can now be taken by appeal or writ of error from a circuit court of the United States to the Supreme Court (except where certain special questions are involved) unless the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of $5,000. (18 Statutes at Large, 315.)

In the judgment of the committee there is neither necessity nor propriety for this disparity in the right of appeal from the highest local tribunals.

Cases in the circuit court are tried before the circuit and district judge, and may be, and very often are, tried before a single judge, without right of appeal or review, except by the same court.

In the District of Columbia and the Territories their judicial systems are substantially the same as those in the several States; the cases are tried before a single judge sitting at nisi prius, with or without a jury, as the parties agree, and all questions of law raised upon the trial are heard and determined by a full court after argument at a law term.

There is no apparent reason why parties who have had an opportunity to have all questions of law involved in their cases deliberately determined by an appellate court should be allowed an appeal in a smaller class of cases than parties in the circuit courts who have no opportunity of review by another distinct tribunal.

It may be that the judges holding the circuit courts are as a rule more experienced and learned judges than the judges of the Territories, but if there be this difference the committee believe it is more than compensated by the advantage of a deliberate review by another court.

The committee do not feel that great evils would arise if the jurisdiction of the highest courts of the District and Territories were made final to the same extent as the courts of the several States, and that appeals and writs of error should be allowed only in cases where Federal questions are involved. But this would produce a change so great and radical as very likely would arouse opposition.

The committee therefore content themselves with reporting the bill as introduced, making the right of appeal uniform from all the courts which seem to stand upon the same legal basis, and to make that uniform with the right of appeal from the circuit courts.

It is well known that the business of the Supreme Court is now largely in arrear, and beyond the power of that court to accomplish, and that the evil is steadily growing.

For years efforts have been made in Congress to devise some remedy, but thus far without success. We fear that all efforts for relief in any of the ways attempted is far distant.

Wisdom seems to dictate effort in the direction of relieving the court of such classes of unimportant litigation, involving no important questions, as may be safely left to the final adjudication of the highest local courts.

This restriction of the right of appeal we believe to be in the real interest of parties as well as the country.

It will be seen that the bill provides for a review of all that class of questions national in character and which ought to be subject to the decision of the national court for national uniformity.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUITS FOR DAMAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. POLAND called up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 7131) to authorize suits for damages where death results from the wrongful act or neglect of any person or corporation in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That when the death of a person is caused in the District of Columbia by the wrongful act or neglect of any person or corporation, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, the person or corporation liable to such action if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death is caused under such circumstances as amount in law to a felony.

SEC. 2. That such action shall be brought in the name of the personal representative of such deceased person, and commenced within two years from the decease of such person; and the court or jury before whom the issue is tried may give such damages as are just, with reference to the pecuniary injury resulting from such death to the wife and next of kin; and the amount recovered shall be for the benefit of such wife and next of kin, who shall receive the same proportions as in the distribution of the personal estate of persons dying intestate.

The report (by Mr. POLAND) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House bill 7131, have considered the same, and unanimously recommend that the same do pass.

At common law no action would lie for injury to a person, caused by the unlawful act or neglect of another, if the injury resulted in death.

Statutes have been in force in England for many years giving an action for damages in such case. Nearly every State has now such statutes, and so just is the principle involved as to now command universal approval.

The statutes of the several States are substantially alike, except that some have and others have not a limitation on the amount of the recovery.

In adopting such a statute for the District of Columbia it was manifest to the committee that a limitation should be fixed for reasons upon which it is not needful to enlarge.

The amendment from the Committee on the Judiciary was read, as follows:

After the word "kin," in line 6, section 2, insert "but not to exceed $10,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill as amended was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELEASE OF GOVERNMENT'S REVERSIONARY RIGHTS.

On motion of Mr. MAYBURY, by unanimous consent the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7619) to release the reversionary right of the Government of the United States to certain lands in the city of Detroit and State of Michigan, and the bill was brought before the House for present consideration.

By an act of Congress approved April 1, 1806 (Statutes at Large, vol. 2, p. 398), the governor and judges of the then Territory of Michigan were authorized to lay out a town upon a site embraced by the old town of Detroit and certain adjacent territory mentioned in said act, and to dispose of the same at their discretion. The purposes of the act were carried out, and, after donating certain lots to citizens who had suffered losses by the fire of 1805, the proceeds accrued from the sale of lots were to be applied under the provisions of the act toward the erection of a court-house and jail within the limits of the town.

In laying out the town in streets, squares, and public spaces certain of these latter were set apart for defined public uses, including public schools. In May, 1807, the governor and judges adopted a series of regulations concerning the uses to which the various public grounds and spaces should be devoted. On one of these public spaces, and being the one now in controversy, there was erected in 1823 a public building known as a court-house, which was afterward used as a Territorial and State capitol building, and continued to be so used until the removal of the State capitol to the present city of Lansing. A county jail was erected upon another of the public spaces so designated. By an act of Congress, approved August 27, 1842, supplementary to the act of 1806 heretofore cited, all the property mentioned in the act of 1806 not disposed of was vested in the city of Detroit, excepting the spaces then occupied by the capitol and county jail, and the residuary powers of the governor and judges passed to the authority of the said city. In 1847 the State capitol was removed from Detroit and the possession of the space mentioned in the memorial and the building erected thereon were surrendered to the city of Detroit by action of the State government.

On the 5th of October, 1847, the common council of the city of Detroit passed a resolution that as soon as the capitol should be vacated by the State authorities the same should be set apart and, under the sole direction of the board of education, should be used for the purposes of the several schools of the city in such manner as said board might direct. By virtue of this resolution the board of education, which is a corporation separate and distinct from that of the city, immediately took possession of said space, establishing first a common school and afterward the high school, which they have since and still maintain, having enlarged and improved the original building by expending thereon the sum of $100,000. In 1874 the city of Detroit, in the exercise of its municipal power, attempted to extend a public street through the space in question; this attempt on the part of the city was resisted on the part of the board of education upon the ground that the action of the city would completely change the nature of the public use to which this space was originally devoted, and that the title and possession of the board of education could not be disturbed. The controversy was terminated by a decision rendered in the supreme court of the State of Michigan (see Board of Education vs. City of Detroit, 30 Mich., 507); the position of the board was sustained, and since that time the city has made no claim to the proprietorship of the premises.

While there is no question of the title of the board of education to the premises so long as used by them for school purposes, yet the question is raised whether, if the interest of education should require a change in the location of the high school, through the encroachment of business interests, the General Government might not claim that under and by virtue of the reservation cited in the act of 1842 the title had reverted to it. It is against this contingency and for the cession of any such reversionary right on the part of the Government that the action of Congress is now invoked.

It is evident to us that the only valid reason that can be assigned for the reservation made in the act of 1842 was that the court-house, as it was then termed, was in the possession of the State, and that Congress did not desire nor deem it expedient to disturb the rights of the State in the premises in favor of the city. In a controversy originating in relation to the site of the jail, which was the other space reserved in the act of 1842, the supreme court of the State of Michigan held that after the removal of the jail the space it had occupied was under the control of the city of Detroit, and sustained the action of the city in granting said space to the board of education for the erection of a public library building. It is clear to your committee that Congress did not intend in the act of 1842 to reserve to the General Government the title or any other interest in the premises, except so far as it was necessary to protect the authorities of the State therein, and when the interest of the State in the premises ceased every reason for the reservation was terminated.

Your committee see no reason why the effect of this reservation should not be dispelled by the legislation requested, that the title to the space in controversy might be as absolute in the board of education as is its title to other public grounds and spaces whereon the schools of the city are erected.

Your committee would therefore recommend the adoption of the bill herewith submitted.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That any right of reversion or otherwise which the United States may be supposed to have in the space on which the high-school building belonging to the board of education of the city of Detroit is situated, being a part of the old town of Detroit, laid out by the governor and judges of the Territory of Michigan, under an act of Congress approved April 21, 1806, entitled "An act to provide for the adjustment of the titles of land in the town of Detroit and Territory of Michigan, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, granted and released to the said board of education.

Mr. ANDERSON. I should like to make an inquiry. Is this the same bill which was before the Public Lands Committee this morning?

Mr. MAYBURY. It was not.

Mr. ANDERSON. Nor on the same subject?

Mr. MAYBURY. No, sir.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MAYBURY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF UNITED STATES LAWS OVER UNORGANIZED TERRITORY.

Mr. TUCKER. I call up from the Calendar the bill (H. R. 489) to extend the laws of the United States over certain unorganized territory south of the State of Kansas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the laws of the United States are hereby extended over the unorganized territory south of the States of Kansas and Colorado and between the Indian Territory and the Territory of New Mexico, known as the public-land strip; and that for the purpose of the execution of said laws said public-land strip is annexed to the judicial district of Kansas and to the southwestern land district in said State; and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to cause the subdivisional lines of townships in said public-land strip to be surveyed, under current appropriations for the surveying service.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROMOTION OF PRIVATE SOLDIERS.

Mr. TUCKER. I now call up House bill 4407 to relieve private soldiers in the United States Army from the disabilities imposed by section 1218 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in so far as it now operates to prohibit the promotion to the positions of commissioned and non-commissioned officers in the regular Army of the United States of any private soldier in said Army, or who may hereafter enlist therein, and who has served, or shall have served, as such private soldier for the period of two years since September 1, A. D. 1866, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

EFFECT OF JUDGMENTS, UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. TUCKER. I now call up the bill (H. R. 7013) to regulate the effect of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States in the several States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That judgments and decrees rendered in a circuit or district court of the United States within any State, shall take effect, by way of lien or otherwise, to the same extent and in like manner, and not otherwise, as judgments and decrees of the courts of such State: Provided, however, That whenever, by the laws of any State, judgments and decrees rendered in the courts thereof are made to depend for their effect, as liens or otherwise, upon the docketing, registry of the same, or upon any other requirement of law, the same shall not be held to apply to the judgments and decrees of the circuit and district courts of the United States, unless now, or until hereafter, the laws of such State shall authorize them to be docketed or registered, or compliance with any other of said requirements, in the same manner as judgments and decrees of the courts of such State: Provided, however, That ninety days from the rendition of any judgment or decree of said courts of the United States hereafter rendered, or from the passage of this act as to any such judgment or decree heretofore rendered, be allowed to any party for compliance with the laws of any State as to the docketing or registry, or other requirements relating to judgments and decrees of the courts thereof; and such compliance shall be held sufficient to give full effect thereto according to said laws, anything therein to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 2. That in all other respects the judgments and decrees of the said courts of the United States shall be enforced and carried into effect according to the laws of said State as if they were rendered in the courts of said State.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith be, and are hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia whether or not the provisions of this bill apply to sales of real estate under decrees of the Federal courts? As he is aware, it is not infrequently the case that levies are made under executions, issued out of the Federal courts, on real estate lying in two or more or even several counties. The question is, whether or not the marshal shall conform to the requirements of the laws of the States in disposing of such property under decrees and judgments in the United States courts; in other words, must the sales be had at the several county seats instead of the place where the United States court is held, or in case of decrees at such time and place as the court may designate? The gentleman, of course, is aware of the fact that there are statutory enactments in many of the States requiring all sales to be made at the county seat.

Mr. TUCKER. The language of the second section of the bill is:

That in all other respects the judgments and decrees of the said courts of the United States shall be enforced and carried into effect according to the laws of said State as if they were rendered in the courts of said State.

In other words, this is to conform the proceedings under judgments and decrees of the Federal courts to the laws of the several States.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. But one of the laws of the States for the enforcement of judgments and decrees of the State courts is, that property levied upon under an execution shall be sold at the county seats. Now, the question is, whether the marshal in executing the process of a Federal court would not be compelled to make the sale at the several county seats wherein the lands are situated in compliance with the State laws?

Mr. TUCKER. Upon execution?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Yes; or under a decree of the court.

Mr. TUCKER. I suppose it would.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Then in the enforcement of a single judgment it might be that you would find it necessary to have sales at a dozen different county seats in which the lands are situated, instead of making the sale from the front door of the Federal court from which the writ issued. I refer to this simply to show that difficulties may arise in the execution of such a provision of law; and whether or not it would be well, in view of that fact, to pass such a bill.

Mr. TUCKER. The Committee on the Judiciary, after mature consideration of the subject, are satisfied that such a provision of law should pass. I do not see why under the Federal judgment any other process should be adopted than under the State courts. They could make a better sale of the property if compelled to sell at the courthouse door than at a distant point, where the Federal court is held. I think we are right about it.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. That may be true in some cases; but I doubt if in all cases it would be a wise provision. I have grave doubts about the correctness of the principle involved. Especially do I think it wiser that we do not disturb the chancery practice as it has obtained in the Federal courts since the foundation of the Government. We ought either to preserve it in its purity, or else conform the entire practice to that of the States. The two systems will not work harmoniously together. I defer greatly in all these matters to the judgment of the Judiciary Committee, but I felt it my duty to mention this matter for its consideration.

Mr. CANNON. It occurs to me that this would impose unnecessary hardships upon the plaintiff without any corresponding benefit to the defendant. In most, if not all, of the States the defendant has from twelve to eighteen months for redemption. In practice there is no competition at such sales, the plaintiff being compelled ordinarily to purchase himself.

Mr. HANCOCK. But we do not have redemption everywhere.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. As I understand the gentleman from Illinois, his mind and mine run in the same channel as to this provision. I know as a matter of fact that it must increase the expenses, and I think will operate unsatisfactorily in a great many cases, and will probably be utterly impracticable in others, in many of the States, depending upon the peculiar legislation that exists in them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

METROPOLITAN POLICE FORCE.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 5668. This bill, I will say, is identical in all respects with a bill now on the Speaker's table passed by the Senate. I ask, therefore, unanimous consent to take from the table the Senate bill and substitute it for the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order the gentleman can call up either bill. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1432) for the relief of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department are hereby directed to allow, and pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to each of such persons, or their legal representatives, who were officers, clerks, and employés of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia on the 28th of February, 1867, a sum equal to 20 per cent. on the salary of such persons as fixed by law, for the time stated in said resolution of the 28th of February, 1867.

Mr. POLAND. The committee have examined this subject very thoroughly, and there is a report of some length accompanying the House bill. I shall not ask to have it read unless some gentleman desires it, but will ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the report will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The report is as follows:

The joint resolution of 1867 provided for the payment of an additional compensation of 20 per cent. on their respective salaries as fixed by law, or where no salary was fixed by law upon their pay respectively, for one year from and after the 30th day of June, 1866, to (among others) "all employés, male and female, in the Executive Mansion, and in any of the following-named Departments, or any bureau or division thereof, namely: State, Treasury, War, Navy, Interior, Post-Office, Attorney-General," &c.

The great point is whether the Metropolitan police force of the city of Washington were, in the sense of the joint resolution, "employés in the Department of the Interior," as they claim. Under the law requiring "the head of each Department to make an annual report to Congress the names of all of the clerks and other persons that have been employed in his Department," &c., the Secretary of the Interior has always reported to Congress the Metropolitan police as a part of his Department, together with the report of the police board, required to be made to the Interior Department.

It is not important to recite all the instances of such reports. They appear to have been regular and uniform. The supervision of the police force has been exercised by the Interior Department, and estimates for appropriations for its payment have been made to Congress by the same Department.

The connection of the police force with the Interior Department, and the right of supervision of that Department over it, has been recognized by the Attorney-General on several occasions when occasion arose to obtain some legal opinion in regard to it.

The police force has always been given in the official register as under the Interior Department.

The First Comptroller of the Treasury rejected the claim of the Metropolitan police to be paid the 20 per cent. under the joint resolution, and also rejected the claims of many other persons of various classes, on the ground that they did not come within the terms of the resolution. Certain claimants, under the joint resolution, commenced suits in the Court of Claims. Some of them were employed under the Commissioner of Public Buildings in various capacities, one was an employé in the office of the Capitol extension, and one (Manning) was a watchman at the jail. These cases were appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of all the claimants was affirmed. (The case is reported in 13 Wallace, 568.)

In an appropriation bill passed July 12, 1870, a provision was inserted:

"That all acts and joint resolutions or parts thereof, and all resolutions of either House of Congress granting extra compensation or pay be, and the same are hereby, repealed, to take effect on the 1st day of July, 1870."

After the passage of this act of 1870 the First Comptroller of the Treasury ruled that it precluded any further payments under the joint resolution of 1867, even if the persons claiming were included within the terms of the joint resolution.

Another suit was brought in the Court of Claims by a large number of claimants employed in various services under the Government in Washington. It is not needful to specify them in detail. The claims were allowed in that court, and the case appealed to the Supreme Court. That court adhered to the liberal view of the proper interpretation of the joint resolution of 1867, announced in the case in 13 Wallace, and also decided that the act of July 12, 1870, above referred to, did not affect the rights given by the joint resolution. (This case is reported in 20 Wallace, 179.)

After the First Comptroller had refused to recognize the claim of the police force, and suits had been brought by other claimants, the counsel of the police force advised them not to commence suit, as the suits commenced would probably settle the questions involved, and save them the expense of litigation.

Before the first suit was decided in the Supreme Court, the act of 1870 had been passed, and that was given as a further reason for refusing payment by the First Comptroller.

The second suit involved the determination of this question with others, and the police force were again advised to await the result of that case, and did so.

After the second decision, the police force again applied for payment, but were refused on the ground that the appropriation to pay this class of claims had been covered into the Treasury, and was not available. In the time of these delays the right to sue in the Court of Claims had expired. The committee are satisfied that the police force were "employés in the Department of the Interior" by law and long and uniform usage, and so entitled to the provision of the joint resolution. The decision of the Supreme Court as to the right of the watchmen and guards at the jail seems to establish the precise ground on which their claim stands.

This claim has been before Congress for several years. It was favorably reported in the Forty-third Congress, but not acted upon. It was passed in the Senate in the Forty-fifth Congress, but not reached in the House. It was favorably reported in the Senate in the Forty-seventh Congress, but not acted upon. It has again been favorably reported by a committee of the Senate at this session.

The right of these petitioners to be paid under the joint resolution seems to have been fully established by the decisions of the Supreme Court.

The reasons for delay on their part to enforce their claim by suit seems to the committee to have been not only reasonable but laudable.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill reported herewith for their relief.

There being no objection, the Senate bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read by its title a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill of the House, No. 5668, will be laid upon the table.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

STATE NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON, MASS.

Mr. TUCKER. I call up the bill (H. R. 2263) and yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2263) for the relief of the State National Bank of Boston, Mass., and that it be brought before the House for present consideration.

Mr. WELLER. I object.

Mr. COLLINS. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of such business as may be brought before it by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COLLINS. I call up the bill (H. R. 2263) for the relief of the State National Bank of Boston, Mass.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claim of the State National Bank of Boston for the sum of $100,000, in gold, deposited by said bank in the subtreasury of the United States at Boston, Mass., February 28, 1867, be, and hereby is, referred to the Court of Claims for its decision and adjudication, upon the merits thereof, as a court of equity and justice, without regard to the statute of limitations or to any technical defense, according to the practice of said court.

SEC. 2. That said claim may be heard and determined by said Court of Claims on the petition of said bank now pending therein. And such portions of the records and findings of fact in case No. 6408, The State National Bank of Boston vs. The United States of America, filed in said Court of Claims January 11, 1872, as are relevant and pertinent to the claim hereby authorized to be heard and adjudicated, may be used as evidence by either party if otherwise competent.

SEC. 3. That there shall be the right of appeal from the finding and judgment of the said Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States, as in other cases.

The bill was reported with the following amendments:

In section 1, line 10, strike out "or any technical defense."

In section 2 strike out all after the word "therein," namely, these words:

"And such portions of the records and findings of fact in case No. 6408, The State National Bank of Boston vs. The United States of America, filed in said Court of Claims January 11, 1872, as are relevant and pertinent to the claim hereby authorized to be heard and adjudicated, may be used as evidence by either party if otherwise competent."

Mr. WELLER. I call for the reading of the report of the committee on this bill.

Mr. COLLINS. I make the point of order that the reading of the report can not be called for as a right unless the gentleman desires to debate the question and makes it a part of his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts is well taken.

Mr. WELLER. Then I desire to make the report a part of my remarks while contending against the correctness of the report.

The report (by Mr. COLLINS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2263) for the relief of the State National Bank of Boston, Mass., submit the following report:

The State National Bank of Boston is a banking corporation, duly established and organized prior to February 28, 1867, under the laws of the United States, and having its place of business in the city of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts.

On that day, February 28, 1867, $725,000 in currency of the money of the State National Bank was abstracted from its possession by a fraudulent conspiracy between the firm of Mellen, Ward & Co., brokers, of Boston, and Julius F. Hartwell, the cashier of the subtreasury at Boston, acting as "the agent of the United States," exchanged for gold coin certificates of the United States, and these certificates deposited in the office of the assistant treasurer at Boston, where they were canceled and then forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States at Washington.

The manner in which this was accomplished has been found by the Court of Claims to be as follows, namely:

About a week before February 28, 1867, Mr. Carter, a member of the firm of Mellen, Ward & Co., went to the banking house of the State Bank, and said to the cashier, Mr. Smith, that he had been employed by the United States Treasurer to make an exchange of gold certificates for gold coin; that the gold certificates would be in the Merchants' National Bank of Boston; that he wished Smith to certify Mellen, Ward & Co.'s checks, drawn on the State Bank, as good at the rate of $125 in currency for every $100 in gold, on receiving the gold certificates; that Mellen, Ward & Co. had no funds in the State Bank, but that he, Carter, had made arrangements with the Merchants' Bank to have the certified checks paid from the proceeds of the sale of gold coin, and that they would not be presented to the State Bank nor go through the clearing-house; Smith agreed to certify the checks, and on February 28 Carter came to him and said that he wished to carry out the arrangement that day; Smith and Carter went to the Merchants' Bank, where Smith certified two checks of Mellen, Ward & Co. as good, one for $250,000 and one for $275,000, drawn on the State National Bank, and received gold certificates of the United States to the amount of $420,000. Carter said that it would be necessary to deposit the gold certificates in the subtreasury for examination, and that Smith would receive a receipt for the amount redeemable on demand; Smith having the gold certificates in his possession, went with Carter to the office of the subtreasury, where they were handed to Hartwell by Smith, who gave in return a receipt as follows:

"UNITED STATES TREASURY, BOSTON.

"Deposited by Mellen, Ward & Co., of Boston, on account of deposits of gold c't'f's, amount four-and-twenty thousand dollars, the same to be exchanged for gold c't'f's, or its equivalent, upon their order or demand.

"Date, February 28, 1867.

"J. F. HARTWELL, Cr."

When Smith asked why the receipt was not made to him, Carter replied, because he, Carter, was the party employed to make the transaction; and he thereupon indorsed upon the certificate:

"Pay only to the order of C. H. Smith, cashier."

Smith took the certificate with him to the State Bank. Later, on the same day, Carter went a second time to the State Bank and said that a further amount was at the Merchants' Bank which he wished to arrange for in the same way. Smith went with him again to the Merchants' Bank, where another check, drawn on the State Bank by Mellen, Ward & Co., was certified as good by Smith for $75,000, and he received in exchange for it $10,000 in gold certificates and $50,000 in gold coin. The gold coin was afterward exchanged for gold certificates, and the two proceeded to the Second National Bank of Boston, where Smith certified another like check for $125,000, and received in exchange gold certificates to the amount of $100,000. He then had in his possession $160,000 of gold certificates; these were taken by Smith to the subtreasury, to be deposited as the others had been, and they were given to Hartwell, who gave the following receipt for them:

"UNITED STATES TREASURY, BOSTON.

"Deposited by Mellen, Ward & Co., of Boston, on acc't of gold certificates deposited, amount $160,000, to be exchanged for gold c't'f's, or its equivalent, on demand.

"Boston, February 28, 1867.

"J. F. HARTWELL, Cr."

This was indorsed:

"Pay only to the order of C. H. Smith, cashier."

These receipts were taken by Smith to the State Bank. The next day he took them to the subtreasury, and was told that they would not be paid.

The purpose of this scheme of fraud was to screen Hartwell, who was an embezzler. Some time prior to February 28, 1867, Hartwell had embezzled the money of the United States, he, as an officer of the Government, having access to and more or less control over the money in the subtreasury belonging to the Government, and placed it in the hands of Carter, who knew that he embezzled it for the use of Mellen, Ward & Co. as a loan. It was known to both Hartwell and Carter that an examination of the assets in the hands of the assistant treasurer at Boston would be made February 28 or March 1, 1867, and Hartwell's guilt discovered. It was to conceal his guilt that the plan was devised and carried into effect, as above stated, and the $580,000 of gold certificates procured and lodged in the subtreasury. Hartwell and Carter intended that after the examination the gold certificates should be returned to Smith; this was not done. After the close of business on February 28, 1867, Hartwell confessed his guilt to Whittle, a clerk in the office of the assistant treasurer, and told him that he had the gold certificates, and how he obtained them. After the office was closed, and while Hartwell and Whittle were on their way home, Whittle learned that Hartwell had the gold certificates with him, about his person, and Whittle induced him to give them to him, and they both returned to the office of the assistant treasurer, where they were canceled and forwarded to the Treasurer at Washington. It will thus be seen that Hartwell, one agent of the United States, fraudulently obtained these certificates, and another agent, with full knowledge of the fraud, and that the certificates did not belong to the Government, consummated the fraud on the rightful owners by canceling the certificates, and turning them into the Treasury Department in settlement of Hartwell's embezzlement.

This was the state of facts March 1, 1867. The Merchants' Bank held Mellen, Ward & Co.'s checks in the State Bank, in which they had no funds, for $600,000, certified as good by Smith, the cashier of the State Bank.

The Second National Bank had a like check for $125,000.

The cashier of the State Bank held the two receipts for $580,000 in gold, or its equivalent, payable on demand.

The United States held the gold certificates for which those receipts were given, knowing that they had been obtained by the fraud of their own agent, and refused to give them up because one of its officers engaged in the fraud had embezzled the funds of the Government.

From these facts many novel and important legal questions arose; among them, the reality of the sales of the gold certificates and the true ownership of them. The Merchants' Bank brought suit against the State Bank to recover $600,000 on the certified checks of Mellen, Ward & Co. it held. This suit was tried before the late Mr. Justice Clifford, of the United States Supreme Court, who, at a second trial, ruled that the Merchants' Bank could not recover. This ruling was ultimately reversed by the full bench, and the State Bank paid the full amount with interest and costs. (See 10 Wall., 604.)

After paying this, the State Bank filed its petition in the Court of Claims to recover the $480,000, without costs or interest. The claim was persistently resisted by the Government; and even after the decision of the Court of Claims in favor of the bank, took the case to the full bench, where, in 1877, ten years after the seizure of the funds, the judgment was affirmed, and the Government paid the bank the sum of $480,000, without interest. This left $100,000 unpaid, which the United States then held and still holds. In their opinion (6 Otto, 30) the court say:

"The finding of the court shows clearly that Hartwell knew when he received the certificates that they did not belong to Mellen, Ward & Co., and that they did belong to the State Bank, represented by Smith as its agent. Hartwell was privy to the entire fraud from the beginning to the end, and was a participant in its consummation. It is not denied that Smith acted in entire good faith; what he did was honestly done, and it was according to the settled and usual course of business. Hartwell was the agent of the United States. He was appointed by them and acted for them. He did, so far as Smith knew, only what it was his duty to do, and what he did constantly for others, and it is not denied that it was according to the law of the land. Smith no more suspected fraud, and had no more reason to suspect it than any other of the countless parties who dealt with the subtreasury in like manner. There could hardly be a stronger equity than that in favor of the plaintiff. * * * But surely it ought to require neither argument nor authority to support the proposition that where the money or property of an innocent person has gone into the coffers of the nation by means of fraud to which its agent was a party, such money or property can not be held by the United States against the claim of the wronged and injured party. The agent was agent for no such purpose. His doings were vitiated by the underlying dishonesty, and could confer no rights upon his principal."

The check for $125,000 given to the Second National Bank was by it transmitted to Jay Cooke & Co., of New York, to whom the gold certificates for $100,000 received through that bank originally belonged. Pitt Cooke, to whom the check was finally passed, commenced suit in New York on that check. This suit involved not only some of the same questions which were embraced in the Merchants' Bank case, but the nature of the original transaction and the title to $100,000 of gold certificates. The case was tried, taken to the general term, and then to the court of appeals, and judgment entered against the State Bank, February 10, 1873. This judgment was paid by the State Bank, and the title to all the gold certificates obtained by Hartwell and seized to pay for his embezzlements was fixed in the State Bank.

The opinion in the case reported in 6 Otto, 20, was not rendered by the United States Supreme Court until 1877, but it settles every question of fact or law that can arise on the merits of the case.

After the Government had paid the $480,000 in accordance with the judgment entered under the mandate of the Supreme Court, there was remaining in the hands of the Government of the United States $100,000 for which the State Bank, under the decision in the Pitt Cooke case, had paid $125,000 and interest from February 28, 1867. To this $100,000 the Government had no legal or equitable right; it had been obtained by the fraud of the agent of the United States, seized by another agent with full knowledge of the fraud, and turned into the Treasury of the United States. It belonged to the State Bank, and in January, 1879, after having made demand on the Secretary of the Treasury, that bank filed its petition for the recovery of the amount in the Court of Claims. The United States filed a general denial and pleaded the statute of limitations. As to the effect of this plea of the statute of limitations, your committee make the following quotation from the very able report of the Committee on the Judiciary presented to the House of Representatives of the Forty-seventh Congress, by Hon. George D. Robinson, the present governor of Massachusetts, to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 28, 1882, page 8:

"Your committee suggest that if the right of action accrued at the time of the original deposit, to wit, February 28, 1867, the statute would seem to be well pleaded, but if it did not accrue until the rights of the parties were determined by decisions in the several suits hereinbefore referred to, or if, as the court intimates in 6 Otto, the United States were trustees for the true owners of the certificates, in which latter case a right of action might not accrue until a demand and refusal, the statute is not well pleaded. But under the language of the act creating the Court of Claims, and a construction recently given (see 99 United States, 493), the statute might be held to bar the claim.

"In view of the fact that the State Bank was constantly engaged for more than ten years in litigation required to determine the facts and to settle the difficult and novel questions of law involved, your committee are of the opinion that the case should be allowed a hearing before the Court of Claims upon its merits."

Your committee suggest that in defending the Pitt Cooke case the State Bank acted as much in the interest of the United States as of itself; for if successful in defending that suit, it would have placed the title to the $100,000 of gold certificates in Mellen, Ward & Co., who were particeps criminis with Hartwell in his embezzlements, and could not have made any claim on the United States.

A simple presentation of dates will justify the statement that the State Bank has not slept on its rights.

The transaction took place February 28, 1867. The United States, without right, and by the fraud of its agents, became possessed of the gold certificates on the same day.

The case of The Merchants' Bank vs. The State Bank, which settled the title to $480,000 of the gold certificates, was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, December term, 1870.

The petition to recover the $480,000 was filed in the Court of Claims in 1872. The final decision on this petition was rendered by the Supreme Court in 1877, ten years after the conversion by the United States of the gold certificates.

The decision in the Pitt Cooke case against the State Bank was rendered by the court of appeals in 1873.

The relief proposed in the present bill has frequently been granted by Congress in similar cases. The attention of your committee has been called to the following instances:

An act approved March 3, 1873, for the relief of Leonidas Haskell.

An act passed by the Forty-second Congress, second session, chapter 89, authorizing the circuit court to hear and determine the claim of Thomas B. Valentine on its merits.

An act for the relief of Robert Tillson & Co., Forty-third Congress, first session, chapter 515, June 23, 1884.

An act by the Forty-fourth Congress, first session, chapter 279, August 14, 1876, for the relief of Harvey & Livesey.

An act by the Forty-fifth Congress, second session, chapter 166, June 7, 1878, directing the Court of Claims to hear the claim of Nannie Hall, "without regard to the statutes of limitation."

An act by the Forty-seventh Congress, March 3, 1883, for the relief of Sterling T. Austin, authorizing the Court of Claims to enter judgment, "any statute of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding."

On the facts presented to your committee, and following the law as laid down in 6 Otto, 30, it seems settled beyond dispute that the United States now holds $100,000 of the money of the State National Bank of Boston; that it obtained this money nearly seventeen years ago by means of a fraud to which its agent was a party, and that it has no equitable or moral right to retain it longer. To deprive the lawful owner of this money by insisting on the statute of limitations, under the facts presented to your committee, would be a violation of the simplest rule of common honesty.

A bill corresponding to the present bill was unanimously approved by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses, and was passed by the House of Representatives of the last-named Congress by a vote of 128 yeas to 22 nays.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. WELLER said: I rise to a question of order. I inquire if the reading clerk has not omitted to read the finding of the court.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk advises the Chair that he inadvertently turned over two pages.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report as printed above.

Mr. WELLER. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty-five minutes of his time remaining.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The Committee of the Whole informally rose, and the Speaker took the chair.

Several messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed a joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 308) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians; and

An act (H. R. 4539) to issue American papers to the lighter or barge Pirate, now at New York.

STATE NATIONAL BANK, BOSTON, MASS.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. WELLER. It seems, Mr. Chairman, that this bill covers matters largely that have already been adjudicated by the courts; $480,000 have already been paid by the Government on an adjudication by the Supreme Court of the United States.

This bill, as it now stands, involves the mere question of having the Court of Claims take full and complete jurisdiction of the amount that is still in abeyance, and provides that the statute of limitations shall be waived. It seems, Mr. Chairman, that in 1867 this transaction occurred—the time that has elapsed being almost twice the statute of limitations. These parties certainly have been sleeping upon their rights.

Mr. STORM. If they have any.

Mr. WELLER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania well says, "if they have any." They have been sleeping upon their rights since 1867 to the present time, which is evidenced by the fact that they request a waiver of the statute of limitations. These parties were engaged in a transaction that was purely personal, or at least in a very large degree personal, between individuals outside of United States authorities. So far as it came within the jurisdiction of United States authority it has been adjudicated, and the judgment of $480,000 has already been paid; $100,000 still remains. And as I have followed the report of the committee, it seems that this is asking the United States Government to come in and out of its Treasury to reimburse private parties because of their dereliction of duty. They certainly could have commenced the case in the proper court within these years. Independently of what might have been or of what was their action in other particulars, there was nothing in the case that barred them from a commencement of a proper suit. And yet they come at this hour and ask that the statute of limitations be waived and that this case go to the Court of Claims upon its merits, and, as I understand, that they shall also be permitted to take testimony, that heretofore has been introduced, as a part of their testimony. It seems to me to be wholly unwarranted by the facts in the case.

I have looked this matter over very carefully, and my belief from the standpoint of mature and deliberate investigation is that the bill ought not to pass.

I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] for ten minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether any motion has been made in regard to this bill, but if not I shall move to strike out in the first section all after the word "adjudication" in the eighth line down to the end of the paragraph. That portion of the bill referring to the records and other proceeding has, I see, been already stricken out by the Judiciary Committee.

When a bill in regard to this transaction was pending in the last Congress it seemed to me there were grave doubts as to the liability of the United States for any portion of this $580,000. But $480,000 have been paid by the Government, and the question now remains whether the $100,000 shall be paid. To my mind the circumstances presented in regard to the relations of the bank and the partnership named and the officers of the subtreasury suggest grave doubts as to whether in this brief statement of the case the full facts are now before us—whether there are not other facts which ought to be known before there can be a proper and fair adjudication of this matter. I do not think, therefore, there could be reasonable objection to referring this bill to the Court of Claims for the purpose of ascertaining the facts, especially if it should be so referred by the ordinary action of the House or the committee under the provisions of the Bowman bill. Indeed, sir, it seems to me it should have occurred to the Judiciary Committee at the very outset that this was an appropriate case to go to the Court of Claims for the purpose of ascertaining the facts, for it seems impossible to read carefully the decision of the Supreme Court without being apprehensive that the real case was not fully before the court, especially as to the personal relations of the parties through whom it is alleged this fraud was perpetrated.

I know nothing about the character of these gentlemen, of course, and nothing about their reputation for integrity; but I know that in reading the decision of the Supreme Court, it seemed to me there was not a full presentation of the case in all its various steps.

Mr. STORM. Does the report in this case disclose that there are any facts in dispute?

Mr. HAMMOND. No.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; as to the facts stated here there is no intimation that there are any matters in dispute.

Mr. STORM. The object of the Bowman bill was simply to refer matters of fact to the court, not matters of law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly. But the question here is whether we have all the facts as to the relations which existed between the officers of the bank and this partnership and the officers of the subtreasury.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether the liability of the Government in this case does not depend upon the action of this agent Hartwell?

Mr. HOLMAN. It does very largely; and that is the very point of embarrassment—to determine whether this fraud was perpetrated by him and his associates connected with the Government, or whether other persons participated and permitted the thing to be done for the purpose of shielding Hartwell from the charge of embezzlement.

Mr. STORM. Upon what principle could the Government be held liable for the criminal acts of its agent?

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend now makes a suggestion which has great force in it, and which of course has sprung up in the minds of all gentlemen who have had occasion to consider to what extent the fraud of this agent of the Government should deprive the Government of the right to hold even equitable property coming into its possession in the ordinary course of proceedings between these banks and the subtreasury at Boston.

But I rose to say a word in regard to the amendment which I desire to offer to the bill. If this matter be referred to the Court of Claims, it seems to me it should be for the purpose of ascertaining and determining the legal rights of this bank. These transactions occurred in February, 1867. It is not pretended that so far as concerns this sum of $100,000 any proceedings were instituted until 1877; and now, when we have reached the year 1885, I think this bank, at the very best, should claim no more against the United States growing out of this transaction than one citizen has a right to claim against another in a court of justice.

In other words, I think the Government of the United States is in a position to take advantage of all legitimate defenses that have sprung up in the course of these transactions from February, 1867, when they arose, up to the present time. I do not see why you should enforce the statute of limitations in your judicial tribunals rigidly and remorselessly against the citizen, and yet waive that statute when you approach a transaction like this involving large sums of money and affecting gentlemen amply able to protect their rights. This statute has been regarded as necessary for the safety of the Government and the protection of its Treasury. In all the States of this Union it is regarded with favor because, in the language of the old writers, it is a statute of repose. The bar of this statute should not be removed, I submit, except where a case of unanswerable equity presents itself. Such cases may arise, especially in the dealings of the Government with its uninformed citizens, those whose circumstances in life do not enable them to be vigilant. Where the rights of the orphan, the widow, the uninformed are involved cases may arise and do constantly arise where no government should interpose the bar of the statute of limitations. But if there can be presented a case where the bar of the statute is proper and just it is such a transaction as this where persons, who have had dealings with the Government and now seek to draw from the Treasury money which has gone there in the regular course of business, allege that in their dealings with a subordinate of the Government, where some duty rested upon them to secure the integrity of the transaction a fraud had interposed.

I see no grounds, sir, upon which this bank can claim that the bar of the statute shall be removed. If this case must go to the Court of Claims let it go there as other demands against the Government go, subject to all the just defenses which the Government of the United States is able to interpose.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. If the statute has run, why send the case to the Court of Claims at all?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it has run, sir. I think that any gentleman who examines the act organizing the Court of Claims, and all the subsequent legislation, must reach that conclusion; but out of abundant caution I have made my motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker took the chair.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage, without amendment, of a bill (H. R. 3661) granting an increase of pension to Lucy L. G. Jeffers.

It further announced that the President pro tempore of the Senate had appointed Messrs. HAWLEY and BECK as members of the Board of Visitors to West Point.

It further requested the return of a bill (S. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Lucy L. G. Jeffers.

It further announced the passage, with amendment, in which concurrence was requested, of a bill (H. R. 3108) to protect fish in the Potomac River in the District of Columbia, and to provide a spawning-ground for shad and herring in the said Potomac River.

STATE NATIONAL BANK, BOSTON, MASS.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes.

Mr. WELLER. I will reserve my time until remarks are made on the other side.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Having taken the floor I believe I am entitled to an hour after the gentleman from Iowa closes. The gentleman speaks in his own time. I do not desire to occupy the time of the House in anticipating him, when I can reply to him by and by.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, I can hardly add anything to the remarks that have been made on this subject by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. I can only emphasize his statement by calling attention to the fact that this transaction occurred in 1867, as shown by the report of the committee. That the statute of limitations has run is very clear, as further shown by the report of the committee. Now, sir, here is a corporation, which is evidently quite able to protect itself, coming to the Congress of the United States and asking favors that are rarely, if ever, granted to the common citizen in any State of the Union. These parties ask that there shall be a waiver of the statute of limitations, and that this case shall be taken to the Court of Claims without regard to the loss of their rights, if any they ever had, by reason of the statute of limitations, or other bar under the law.

Now, I appeal to my friends the Republicans, and to my friends the Democrats, and to you all as friends of the people—I appeal to you to allow this corporation no rights but such as are commonly granted to the people of the United States in the courts in the several States. I think, Mr. Chairman, that if we are to grant special rights and favors to any person or class of persons, it should be to the common people instead of to corporations, which, as I have already said, are well able to protect themselves. We are on the eve of an incoming administration in the line of reform, and I would like to see a change from the system that has been in operation for at least the last fifteen years—I would like to see a change in the order of things, so as to let the great mass of the common people be protected and have their interests aided and abetted by this House, rather than that its powers should be exercised in behalf of corporations or powerful individuals that are abundantly able to care for themselves.

As to my own State I doubt whether any individual in Iowa in the whole history of the State has come before the court to ask them to waive in his behalf the statute of limitations. That statute is very rigidly enforced, and I understand that, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has well stated, it is the rule in all the States to enforce the statute of limitations as a means of promoting repose between parties. In this case nearly twenty years have elapsed, the case has been adjudicated by the highest judicial tribunals in the land; they have made an award; that award has been paid, and now these parties are coming in appealing to the representatives of the people for favors and advantages that they can not get in any court, but can get only, if at all, through the House of Representatives. I trust that my Republican friends and my Democratic friends and all the members of this House, as friends of the people, will see to it that this bill does not pass; or at least that if in any particular it does pass this House it be only in such form as to refer the matter to the Court of Claims, that they may report to the House all the facts in the case. It may be that these parties, with their abundant wealth, have in some way presented a fair prima facie case; it may be that they have withheld important facts which, if they could be brought to light by the Court of Claims and brought to the attention of this House, would entirely alter the aspect of the case, so that thereafter the House of Representatives would spurn the idea of further considering this bill or any of the features embodied in it. I trust that that will be the action of the House.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I understand there is a general agreement that after a very short reply the committee will rise. If not I shall move to have the committee rise now to limit the debate.

Mr. WELLER. I make no such agreement as that.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing the general debate on the pending bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2263) for the relief of the State National Bank of Boston, Mass., and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. COLLINS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and pending that motion I move that all general debate on the pending bill in the committee shall be closed in ten minutes after its consideration shall have been resumed.

Mr. WELLER. Say thirty minutes—fifteen minutes to each side.

Mr. HOLMAN. There will be left the debate on the amendments under the five-miuute rule.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is to limit the general debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume so.

The SPEAKER. That is all that can be done at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. WELLER. I will modify my motion so as to make it twenty minutes—ten minutes on each side.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as the five-minute debate is left, I think the gentleman from Iowa will agree with me that will be ample.

Mr. WELLER. I do not think gentlemen ought to object to making it twenty minutes—ten minutes to each side.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. WELLER. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 3, noes 64.

Mr. WELLER. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. COLLINS and Mr. WELLER.

Mr. COLLINS. I am willing to give the gentleman twenty minutes if he wishes that time.

Mr. WELLER. It will be agreeable to me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Massachusetts to modify his motion so as to limit general debate to twenty minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2263) for the relief of the State National Bank of Boston, Mass., and by order of the House all general debate is limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman unless the rules which prevail between man and man of common honesty are set aside in considering this question, and unless a bank is to be pilloried whenever it is seen, then this bill should pass.

The proposition made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that this bill be referred to the committee under the Bowman act is an utterly useless thing to do, inasmuch as the Court of Claims have passed on every fact involved in this litigation in case No. 6887. There is no pretense here on the part of any human being that every fact in this case is not known. The amendment is intended therefore to have the effect to kill the bill.

The gentleman from Indiana says this money was received into the United States Treasury in the ordinary business way. I never knew before it had been claimed by an American legislator that stolen money—money stolen by an agent of the United States and put into the Treasury—was received in the ordinary business way. The fact is the Court of Claims, the United States being defendant and this bank the plaintiff, found the fact to be that $580,000 in gold belonging to this bank was then in the Treasury of the United States without any right on the part of the holder. The United States appealed to the Supreme Court, and by the decree and mandate of the Supreme Court this State Bank of Boston received this $480,000. My friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] says it was a large sum of money. It was indeed a large sum of money for an agent of the United States to steal from one party.

It is now asked why the $480,000 was paid and this was not paid. It was because the suit in which the State Bank had litigated defending the checks drawn against it covering $480,000 was decided before the statute of limitations had run. Then they filed their petition against the United States. They defended against this $100,000 check which we seek to settle. They defended against that, but the statute of limitations had run before the matter was decided. They defended, as the report shows, in the interest of the United States, and had they won their case they would not be suitors here to-day.

Now, then, the United States hold, as the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses through their Judiciary Committees have held unanimously, as also the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court of the United States, that $100,000 of this money belongs to the State Bank of Boston, and the question is whether we shall raise the technical defense or permit it to be raised that one honest man in this country, whether he be from Indiana or from Iowa, would not raise against his neighbor whose servant had stolen his money. The United States of America is large enough to be honest and too mighty, I think, to be technical. Its attorneys in the courts are obliged to raise these technical defenses just as the attorney of any man in this House would raise a technical defense if he were not instructed to waive it by his principal or employer. The people who lost this $100,000 nearly twenty years ago now ask you to give them back the money without interest, and that is all they ask.

And in addition, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the Government of the United States does not lay any claim to this money at all.

Mr. COSGROVE. The money is in the Treasury, is it?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COSGROVE. Acknowledged to be the money of the bank?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make one or two other suggestions in connection with my opposition to this bill.

The pensioners of the United States when they apply for their pensions, if they have permitted the legal period to elapse, are referred to the statute of limitation. You apply that same principle in the consideration of war claims, hundreds and thousands of dollars of which are due all over the country, and your statute of limitation has been allowed to run strictly against them. There is no redress of grievances anywhere, and yet when a corporation comes here for relief you are prompt to render it. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, but that I may have an undue feeling in this case, not so much, perhaps, because this is a corporation as that it is one of those infamous, undemocratic, unrepublican, and unconstitutional corporations—a national bank corporation. I do not know but that I have undue prejudice; but I say, sir, we are asked to consider claims here that would not for a moment be considered outside of the Congress of the United States of America. Now, for my part, I desire to have an overturning of the present régime, and the policy that has been pursued in these matters. Instead of letting everything go through I want to hold these men, when they come to this court of last resort, to the very same strict rule that you apply to the private citizen. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, there is one fact in reference to this case that I am not quite sure is understood by the committee, as the debate has not been generally heard.

There were originally $580,000 in dispute with this bank, $480,000 of which was in the hands of certain holders in Massachusetts. Suits were brought and the bank demanded, as in duty it should have done, that these parties should show whether or not there was a liability. The Massachusetts court decided that there was. They recovered that sum through the Court of Claims, the decision of which was affirmed subsequently by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The other $100,000 had fallen into the hands of some New York party, Jay Cooke, I believe. The courts of New York operated more slowly than the courts of Massachusetts. The decision of the Massachusetts court came in time for the suits to be brought for the recovery of the $480,000, which sum, as I have said, was recovered. But the recovery on the claims in the hands of the parties in New York was so slow, owing to the process in the courts, that when the bank had to pay, the statutory bar for time for suit between it and the United States had run. Now, our court having decided that the $480,000 ought to be paid, and the facts being exactly the same in both cases, for the swindling was by the same officer, at the same time, and out of the same bank, the Committee on the Judiciary, after mature consideration, have come to the conclusion that we should pay the principal of this debt.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the first section of the bill for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claim of the State National Bank of Boston for the sum of $100,000, in gold, deposited by said bank in the subtreasury of the United States at Boston, Mass., February 28, 1867, be, and hereby is, referred to the Court of Claims for its decision and adjudication, upon the merits thereof, as a court of equity and justice, without regard to the statute of limitations or to any technical defense, according to the practice of said court.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

In line 10, strike out the words "or to any technical defense."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as an amendment which I propose covers the amendment of the committee, I suppose the question will first be taken upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the amendment of the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. My amendment is to strike out all after the word "adjudication," in the eighth line, which embraces the words proposed to be stricken out by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question will be taken upon the amendment of the committee, after which the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana will be in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. But where two propositions are pending, one to strike out the whole of a paragraph and the other a part, I ask if the motion to strike out the whole paragraph is not first in order? It may be, however, that the Chair is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be taken upon the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, I move to strike out all after the word "adjudication," in the eighth line, being the following words:

Upon the merits thereof, as a court of equity and justice, without regard to the statute of limitations as to any technical defense, according to the practice of said court.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the subject-matter is referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication that covers the whole ground, of course, and there is no necessity for the incorporation of the words which I have proposed to strike out. That is to say, this bank ought to be put in no better condition than any other citizen seeking redress through the Court of Claims in a case of which that court had jurisdiction.

We confer the jurisdiction upon the court to determine this case, but I insist it shall go no further than the law of the land would go in allowing this bank to go into the court and have its rights established under the law.

I have said all I desire to say in regard to the impropriety of extending peculiar favors to this bank which we refuse to the great body of our people. I have sought to suggest that to enforce the statute of limitations against the uninformed citizens of the country in general, and to open it up in favor of those possessing full information and full ability to act would be a discrimination scarcely worthy of Congress.

Mr. COLLINS. Of course it is understood, Mr. Chairman, if this amendment should pass the bill is dead. The Court of Claims has already done in this very case what the gentleman from Indiana suggests may be done. Now he says, and repeats what he said before, that we are undertaking to treat this bank as a specially favored subject, and not favored alike with the rest of our citizens. Not at all. The same law runs for the United States as for any defendant who goes into court to defend a suit. But an honest man whose clerk had stolen money which was a subject of litigation would certainly waive the statute of limitations if he merely held the money as trustee for the honest owner of it; and nobody but a dishonest man and no government but a dishonest government would keep stolen money when it admits that the ownership lies elsewhere.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Government of the United States does not admit this is stolen money the ownership of which lies elsewhere. On the contrary I undertake to say there is great doubt about the liability of this Government to refund this money, and that there has been great doubt of it from the beginning. The discussions heretofore indulged in on this floor which have been careful and extensive have demonstrated the fact of its being exceedingly questionable whether this bank has any claim on the Government whatever, and exceedingly doubtful whether the agent of the Government was the only party in complicity with this fraud.

Mr. MORSE He was the only one convicted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I concede that he was the only one convicted; but it was always a question of doubt who the persons really were for whose benefit the fraud was committed.

Mr. RANNEY. It was not committed for the benefit of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is said to have been committed to cover up a defalcation of an officer of the subtreasury. What I insist is that the same law shall apply to this corporation as applies to every citizen of the United States. You say to your citizens the statute of limitations may be pleaded by the Government just as it is in every State of this Union. There is not a State of this Union but has found it wise on the ground of high public policy that a statute of limitations should be rigidly enforced in the interest of justice as well as in the interest of peace. What I object to specially here is discrimination in favor of one class of our citizens as against the great body of our people.

Last session Congress passed a bill opening up the statute of limitations for the benefit of certain banks in the city of New York. I think no gentleman read the views of the President of the United States upon that subject without feeling that it was not well for Congress to single out here and there in the interest of well-informed persons cases where the statute should be raised and keep it down steadily against the great body of our people. The statute of limitations is a wise provision, and is so considered by every State of the Union, and Congress ought not to remove it except in cases where justice imperatively demands it.

I admit that in the case of a widow, for example, not informed of her rights, or in the case of an orphan child, not supposed to have knowledge of claims against the Government, it would be a hardship and an impropriety for Congress to insist that the limitations should be enforced. But in cases between parties having large and extensive dealings with the Government, out of which dealings this difficulty arose some twenty years ago, it does seem to me if the statutes of limitations is proper in any case it is proper here.

Mr. WELLER. I desire as a part of my remarks to address an inquiry to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COLLINS]. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana shall prevail and this case goes to the Court of Claims, and they take all the testimony and return the testimony to this House for its consideration thereafter, will not the gentleman having the bill in charge have just as much right and all of his rights with the House thus informed as he has to-day?

Mr. COLLINS. I will answer that question by saying that when the Court of Claims gets through with this case, if the amendment prevails, we shall simply have this returned to us in the same position as we have to-day. That is all we shall ever know about it.

Mr. WELLER. I assume, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Massachusetts is in error in regard to this matter. I apprehend if this case goes to the Court of Claims with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, and the Court of Claims, taking all of the testimony, as it will be its duty to do, returns the testimony to this House for its consideration, there will be developments made that are not observed by the members of this House to-day, and which, being observed, will change their opinions as to the merits of this bill.

I assume that; and I assume another thing—that every right which the gentleman has, every right which every party under this bill has to-day will be as good then as now; while the House will have the advantage of being fully advised. Nothing can be lost but the mere matter of time, while there may be great advantage in the protection of the rights of this House and the people, who by this means might be so fully advised that there would not be on this floor a vote in favor of this bill as now framed without the amendment.

I trust the amendment will be adopted in the interest of fair play and of equity. I do not wish to be considered as desiring that the Government shall retain any money that has been stolen from anybody; but I do say that the circumstances of this case, as disclosed in the report of the committee, convince me that further investigation should be had before this bill shall pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] withdraw his formal amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do.

Mr. MORSE. I renew the formal amendment. I feel it my duty to say that there is one particular point in this case which I think has not been generally understood by members of the House. At the subtreasury in Boston there was employed a man named Hartwell, who had access to the money of the Government. He speculated with it, and lost a very large amount in his speculations. One day he was informed that the agents of the Government were coming to Boston to investigate the condition of the treasury. Knowing that there was a large deficit, he went, among other places, to this very bank that is now applying here for its money, and by fraud obtained the money, with which he tried to make good his accounts in the treasury. His fraud being discovered, he was tried, convicted, and sentenced, and served out his entire term of imprisonment. Before serving out his term he appealed to the United States court, claiming that the court which tried him had no jurisdiction over him, denying that he was an employé of the subtreasury at Boston. The court overruled his appeal; and, as I have said, he served out his entire time, as the records will show, for having obtained by fraud this money now in the Treasury. These people now simply say, "Give us back the money which a court of the United States decided was taken from us by fraud." That, I understand, is the entire case in a nutshell.

Mr. WEAVER. What position did Hartwell hold?

Mr. MORSE. He was a clerk in the subtreasury at Boston, holding his position by the approval of the Government here at Washington. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced in a United States court. He appealed, claiming that the United States court had no jurisdiction in his case; but his appeal was overruled upon the ground that he was an employé of the Government.

Mr. COLLINS. He was cashier of the United States subtreasury.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does the Government claim that this money in fact belonged to the Government?

Mr. COLLINS and Mr. MORSE. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. The officers of the Government have insisted over and over again that there was no fraud for which the United States should be liable.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does the gentleman from Indiana claim that the Government has a right to retain this money?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does the Government claim that this money belongs to it?

Mr. HOLMAN. All I can say is that officials of the Government have never conceded, so far as I am advised, that a dollar of this money went wrongfully into the Treasury. I have never seen an intimation from any source that the Government did not resist the payment of the whole of this money from the beginning through all the courts.

Mr. COLLINS. The Supreme Court has said the Government does not own the money.

Mr. HOLMAN. The money is now claimed by the officials of the Treasury.

Mr. COLLINS. Oh, they claim everything.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, to strike out all of the first section after the word "adjudication," in the eighth line, there were—ayes 46, noes 61.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. COLLINS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 105.

So the amendment was rejected.

The next section of the bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. That said claim may be heard and determined by said Court of Claims on the petition of said bank now pending therein. And such portions of the records and findings of fact in case numbered 6408, The State National Bank of Boston vs. The United States of America, filed in said Court of Claims January 11, 1872, as are relevant and pertinent to the claim hereby authorized to be heard and adjudicated, may be used as evidence by either party if otherwise competent.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out, in section 2, the following:

"And such portions of the records and findings of facts in case numbered 6408, The State National Bank of Boston vs. The United States of America, filed in said Court of Claims January 11, 1872, as are relevant and pertinent to the claim hereby authorized to be heard and adjudicated, may be used as evidence by either party if otherwise competent."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next section of the bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. That there shall be the right of appeal from the finding and judgment of the said Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States, as in other cases.

Mr. COLLINS. I now move that the committee rise and report this bill to the House with a recommendation that it be passed as amended.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 95, noes 26.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that there is no quorum voting. If the committee reporting this bill will consent that a yea-and-nay vote shall be taken upon the main proposition with reference to the statute of limitations, I will agree that the bill may be reported to the House.

Mr. HAMMOND. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. COLLINS were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 128, noes 35.

So the motion was agreed to.

JAMES HOOPER.

Mr. MOULTON. I desire to call up House bill No. 736, being a bill for the relief of James Hooper. This bill involves the payment of no money out of the Treasury. It simply provides to refer the claim to the Court of Alabama Claims. The money for the payment of this claim is already in the hands of the Government, and this bill merely refers it to the Court of Alabama Claims for adjudication. If no one asks for the reading of the report, I will move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. MOULTON. Mr. Chairman, before the report is read, if the committee will give their attention, I will make a brief statement so that gentlemen may understand the point in this case. The claimant was the owner of the bark General Berry, which was in the employ of the Government in 1864 for the purpose of transporting supplies from the city of New York to Fortress Monroe. The Government had insured the vessel to the extent of $16,000, which was only a small part of her value. The vessel was captured and destroyed. Subsequently the matter was adjudicated and passed upon by the court, but they simply allowed the claimant $16,000; allowing nothing for the additional value of the vessel and its equipments, amounting to some $30,000. Later the whole amount was put in under a statement and went in among the other Alabama claims, and the claim was recognized and the money for its payment is now in the hands of the Government. By reason of the adjudication to which I have referred the claimant has been unable to get any more than the $16,000. This was one of the very first cases adjudicated, and the rules that were applied to subsequent cases were not applied to this.

In the very next case passed upon by the same tribunal, the case of another vessel lost a few days afterward, they made an allowance of the whole value of the vessel over and above the war risk. The report in this case sets out the facts, and, as it is very short, and as its reading has been asked for, I think it had better be read. The committee will understand that this claim is only for the difference between the amount received and the total value of the property.

A MEMBER. How much is it in money?

Mr. MOULTON. It is about $30,000. The whole value of the vessel was about $41,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] insist upon the reading of the report?

Mr. MCMILLIN. My only object in calling for the reading was to find out something about the claim.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 736) for the relief of James Hooper, having considered the same, make the following report:

The object of this bill is to authorize and require the Court of Alabama Claims to reopen the case of James Hooper vs. The United States, decided in December term, 1874, of said court, and to allow the claimant to be reheard in regard to his claim, as provided by said bill.

This claim grows out of the loss of the bark General Berry, owned by James Hooper, and destroyed by a confederate cruiser while chartered and in the service of the United States.

Your committee deem it proper to state that the case referred to was one of the very first decided by the said court, and the rules of decisions afterward adopted in cases of this character were not applied in the decisions of the case of Mr. Hooper. By this decision no allowance was made for the difference between the war risk of the bark assumed and paid by the Government and the real value of the vessel, the same being $28,150.20. This last sum has never been paid Mr. Hooper.

The following is a short statement of the case, as it fully appears from the proof and papers on file, and submitted with the case:

"STATEMENT.

"The claimant, James Hooper, in June, 1864, chartered to the United States the bark General Berry, owned by him, for the transportation of quartermaster's stores from New York to Fortress Monroe, for the use of the Union Army. On the 10th day of July, 1864, she was captured and destroyed off Cape May, N. J., by the confederate steamer Florida.

"Four years afterward, it having been shown that the claimant had not insured the vessel in any private insurance company, for the reason that the understanding was that the United States assumed the war risk on the vessel, Congress appropriated $16,000 as an indemnity to him for the risk so assumed by the Government.

"Subsequently, during the negotiations between the Government of Great Britain and the United States in reference to the depredations of the Alabama and other confederate cruisers, advertisement was made for claimants to send to the State Department their claims for losses sustained by them through these cruisers, the intention being to submit these claims to the 'Geneva arbitrators,' as the basis of the indemnity demanded by the United States from Great Britain. Mr. Hooper accordingly filed his claim for the loss of the General Berry, and the statement of his claim was as follows:

Vessel, 462.78 tons, valued at $90 per ton		$41,650 20
Deduct amount received from United States (July 15, 1868)	$16,000 00
Less costs and expenses of collection (if allowable)	2,500 00
		13,500 00
Net balance due for vessel		28,150 20
Freight and primage on board	1,014 07
One chronometer	250 00
Hicks & Bell, ship stores and provisions	445 89
Bentz & Co., advance to crew	600 50
Hugh & Murry, ballast	300 00
		2,610 46
Total due		30,760 66
William B. Hooper (master), personal effects	845 00
Thomas J. Hooper (officer), personal effects	422 50
Aaron Ring, Bath, Me. (chain-cable)	815 32
		2,082 82
		32,843 48

"This sum of $32,843.48 was included in the list of claims sent to Geneva. Increased by a claim for the wages of seamen, the amount finally presented was $35,918, and the arbitrators allowed $40,737, and that last-mentioned sum was included in the final award. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 2, part 5, first session Forty-third Congress; also Executive Documents, third session Forty-second Congress, Foreign Relations, part 2; Geneva Arbitrators, vol. 3, page 625.)

"Subsequently the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims was established by act of June 23, 1874 (18 Statutes at Large, page 245), by the twelfth section of which it was provided as follows:

"'No claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court for any loss or damage for or in respect to which the party injured, his assignees or legal representatives, shall have received compensation or indemnity from any insurance company, insurer, or otherwise; but if such compensation or indemnity so received shall not have been equal to the loss or damage so actually suffered, allowance may be made for the difference.'

"Under this section the claimant brought suit before that court, and all the foregoing amounts were allowed, except the claim for the vessel itself, $28,150.20, which was rejected.

"This decision is unintelligible to the claimant, inasmuch as the amount of the claim was actually collected and received by the United States from Great Britain, and the money is in the Treasury in trust for him; and inasmuch, also, as shortly afterward allowance was made for the bark Greenland, destroyed under precisely similar circumstances, and for which a similar part payment had been made by the United States. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, &c., ibid.)

"It will be perceived that the sum of $16,000, paid by the United States as insurers of the vessel, does not enter at all into the claim forwarded by the Government to Geneva as the award finally allowed by the arbitrators, and that the award was for a balance due the claimant. This balance is payable to him independently of the $16,000 allowed by the Government.

"The mistake of the commissioners seems to have resulted from their having regarded the payment by the Government as a payment in full for the vessel, whereas, on the contrary, the Government itself did not regard it as any such payment in full. Yet they fell into no such mistake in reference to the Greenland.

"That the payment of $16,000 by the Government was a payment on account of the war risk, and as agreed insurance upon the vessel, is evident from the report made by the Senate Committee on Claims on March 13, 1868, upon which the claim for $16,000 was allowed and paid, after refusal, in the first instance, by the accounting officers of the Treasury, who took the view that the Government had not assumed the war risk. The payment was for the insurance of the vessel, and not payment, either in part or in whole, for the vessel.

"There is yet in the Treasury of the United States upwards of $32,000 paid by the British Government to the United States on account of the loss of the General Berry; and it is to establish his right to this sum, and to review what seems to have been a hasty and ill-considered, and certainly erroneous, decision of the Court of Alabama Claims Commissioners, that the claimant now seeks the intervention of Congress."

Therefore your committee report said bill to the House and recommend its passage.

Mr. MOULTON. Mr. Chairman, I think gentlemen must see that this is an eminently just claim, and I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Illinois. I notice that the last clause of this bill assumes that judgment will be rendered for the plaintiff, and provides for its payment. Ought not the provision to be that in the event of judgment being rendered for the plaintiff it shall be paid in such and such a manner?

Mr. MOULTON. This is the last clause of the bill:

And thereupon to render such judgment in the premises as may be just and proper, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the time the loss occurred, on such sum as may be due the said James Hooper.

Mr. HOLMAN. That assumes that judgment is to be rendered for the plaintiff.

Mr. MOULTON. No. The bill provides that the court shall consider the whole case and render such judgment as may be just and proper, and then it provides that if any allowance is made it shall be upon these terms.

Mr. HOLMAN. It provides that the court shall "render such judgment in the premises as may be just and proper."

Mr. MOULTON. Certainly; taking the facts of the case into consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. "Such judgment in the premises as may be just and proper, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum"—that certainly assumes that judgment is to be rendered for the plaintiff.

Mr. MOULTON. I make the motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

L. A. MORRIS.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I call up House bill No. 3196, being a bill for the relief of L. A. Morris.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remit a judgment obtained in the Federal court at Fort Smith, Ark., against L. A. Morris, upon his bond as an Indian trader, for the sum of $5,000, in favor of the United States, upon the payment of all the costs accrued in the prosecution of the cause.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I think we ought to have some explanation of that bill, and I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3196) for the relief of L. A. Morris, have considered the same, and make the following report:

On the 25th day of September, 1875, suit was instituted in the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas, at Fort Smith, in behalf of the United States, against T. T. Maxwell and L. A. Morris, under the name and style of Maxwell & Morris, partners in trade, John A. Fitch, and John Dorchester, to recover the penalty of a bond executed by the said Maxwell & Morris, as traders in the Choctaw Nation. The breach alleged in the complaint consisted in a violation of that provision of the bond which obligated the said Maxwell & Morris to obtain a license from the local authorities of the Choctaw Nation before offering or exposing their goods for sale.

On the 11th day of November, 1878, the suit was dismissed as to all the defendants except L. A. Morris, and judgment was recovered against him for the sum of $5,000, the penalty of the bond.

The facts in the case appear to be as follows: In 1875 Maxwell & Morris, having been appointed Indian traders, executed the bond declared upon, and the same was presented to and approved by E. P. Smith, Indian Commissioner. Upon the execution and approval of the bond license was duly issued to said Maxwell & Morris to trade in the Choctaw Nation.

L. A. Morris applied to George W. Ingalls, agent for the five civilized tribes of Indians, to ascertain if it was necessary to obtain a permit to trade from the local authorities of the Choctaw Nation, and was informed by him that it was not necessary. He was advised by Ingalls, the Indian agent, to get up a petition signed by a number of leading or prominent men, asking for the privilege of trading with the Indians. The petition was prepared and the signatures of several persons obtained, but was never presented, as, under the advice of the Indian agent, a permit was not believed to be necessary. One condition of the bond recites that "the principal shall faithfully conform to and observe all the laws and regulations made, or which shall be made, for the government of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes." By reference to the treaty existing between the United States and the Choctaw Nation it will be seen that, in addition to the license granted by the Government, permission must be obtained from the local authorities of the nation before it shall be lawful to sell or expose for sale goods in the Territory.

It was also in proof before the court that shortly after Maxwell & Morris commenced selling the goods their store was closed by order of the authorities of the nation, and considerable damage resulted to the stock of goods on account of the seizure.

Upon this statement of facts the court gave judgment against L. A. Morris for the sum of $5,000, the penalty of the bond.

In view of the facts in the case, the committee believe that Morris did not intend to violate the law, and if such violation was established before the court it was merely technical.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had, according to order, had under consideration bills coming from the Judiciary Committee under the special order, and had directed him to report back sundry bills.

STATE NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON.

The SPEAKER. The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar is the bill (H. R. 2263) for the relief of the State National Bank of Boston, Mass.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 93.

So (one-fifth of those present having voted in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 116, nays 63, not voting 144; as follows:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents the memorial of the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, remonstrating against the purchase of the portrait of General George H. Thomas named therein. The Chair understands that the Committee on the Library reported on the subject an amendment to an appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The Chair will therefore refer the memorial to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McPHERSON. I present the petition of Ralph S. Demarest, of Demarest, N. J., praying that no review of the Venezuela awards shall be had until provision shall have been made for him and for all those citizens of the United States who like him purchased the certificates of the Caracas commission on the faith of the treaty and of the act of Congress declaring that the awards were final and conclusive and were to be held as valid and subsisting against the Republic of Venezuela. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent to present a communication from the Baltimore Corn and Flour Exchange, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty. It is a letter addressed to me, but evidently intended for presentation to the Senate. I ask that it may be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of Arthur P. Nazro, lieutenant, United States Navy, and other officers of the Navy, praying for legislation in relation to rank and promotion in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Lewis Countryman and 100 other citizens of Iowa, praying for the passage of an act of Congress for the resumption of certain lands within the limits of the grant to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company, and that settlers on those lands shall be protected in their rights; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOLPH. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Charles Murphy, of California, praying compensation for certain work done by him on the dry-dock at Mare Island, California, to report it adversely. I beg the indulgence of the Senate to say that no other claim has been so earnestly and persistently pressed upon the consideration of the committee at the present Congress as this claim, and no other claim has been so carefully considered by the committee. The committee, desiring to be right and fully informed, gave the claimant and his attorneys at the last session a hearing and at the present session a rehearing; and this report is the unanimous report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the report of the committee will be agreed to and the prayer of the petitioner denied. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SHEFFIELD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2046) for the relief of Rittenhouse Moore, of Alabama, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WILSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3691) for the relief of Joshua Shepard, to report it adversely.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 164) for the relief of John C. Herndon, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1566) for the relief of O. L. Cochran, late postmaster at Houston, Tex., reimbursing him for money erroneously collected from him by the Post-Office Department, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; which was agreed to.

CAPTAIN WHEELER'S REPORT.

Mr. GORMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print the report of Capt. George M. Wheeler, to report it back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be first read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the report of Capt. George M. Wheeler, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, on the Third International Geographical Congress and Exhibition at Venice, Italy, with the accompanying illustrations, transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of War on December 10, 1883, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the resolution be now considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The amendment reported by the committee will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of Capt. George M. Wheeler, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, on the Third International Geographical Congress and Exhibition at Venice, Italy, with the accompanying illustrations, transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of War on the 10th of December, 1883, be printed in quarto form, and that 3,500 additional copies be printed; of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House, and 500 copies for the Department of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ELECTORAL-VOTE MESSENGERS.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations instruct me to report an original bill in response to the message of the President of yesterday, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be put upon its passage.

The bill (S. 2540) to provide for the expense and compensation of special messengers to be sent by the Secretary of State to the States respectively of Iowa and Oregon for the certificates of the electoral vote of 1884 for President and Vice-President of the United States, in pursuance of the provisions of section 141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill be now considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $1,500 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the compensation, expenses, or mileage, as the case may be, of two messengers, one to the State of Iowa and one to the State of Oregon, to receive from the United States district judge in each of said States the certificate of the electoral vote of November, 1884, for President and Vice-President of the United States, deposited with such judges under the provisions of section 140 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and called for by the Secretary of State under the provisions of section 141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

SEC. 2. The sum hereby appropriated shall be immediately available and shall be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not quite hear the reading. I understood from the Chief Clerk that the word "November" was inserted at a certain place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill describes the electoral vote as having been given in November instead of December.

Mr. ALLISON. I move an amendment to cure that defect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to strike out the word "November," where it occurs, and insert the word "December." If there be no objection that amendment will be considered as agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have the Senator from Iowa make some explanation of the bill. Why is it that we have to send to these States for the electoral returns?

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the reason to be that the returns have not been deposited as the law requires.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would it not then be well to send a copy of the laws and regulations to these two respective States, in order that their electors may know what to do in future, and that we may not have to send special messengers at great expense to bring in the votes that they cast for President and Vice-President?

Mr. ALLISON. It is hardly worth while to put that in the statute. It might be well enough to intimate to the messenger that a copy of the laws should be sent. I understand that these returns are not here as the law requires, and therefore that this action is necessary. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. DOLPH. If I understand the case correctly, although I did not catch the reading of the bill at the moment and do not know exactly what it is intended to accomplish, the certificate has been received in due form from Oregon by messenger, but the certificate required to be sent by mail has not been received in due form. Without looking at the law, as I recollect its provisions, if the certificate sent by mail is not received within a given time it is made the duty of the Secretary of State to send for the certificate which is required to be deposited with the district judge. The return from Oregon, by mail as well as the one sent by messenger, would have been here in time had it not been for an unusual detention of the mails. The fact is, however, that the first return which came by mail was without the necessary indorsement upon the outside of the package, but another return in due form would have been received by mail had it not been for a snow blockade upon the line of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company's road, which prevented its arrival in Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MADISON R. CALVERT.

Mr. SHEFFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4273) for the relief of Madison R. Calvert, to report it favorably. The committee have adopted the House report, which contains about twelve lines, and if the Senate will permit it to be read I ask for the present consideration of the bill, as I am sure there will be no objection.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Madison R. Calvert, an assistant paymaster in the United States Navy, $501, to reimburse him for a like amount stolen from his paymaster's safe on the United States steamer Mayflower, and made good by him.

Mr. SHEFFIELD. I ask for the reading of the House report, which the Senate Committee have adopted.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. DOWD June 26, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4273) for the relief of Madison R. Calvert, having examined the same, respectfully report:

The money ($501) which is the basis of this claim was stolen from the safe of the paymaster, then in charge of said Calvert as assistant, on board the United States steamer Mayflower, while the said Calvert was on shore by permission.

The facts show that the safe was entered by the use of a key; that there had been two keys for the safe, only one of which ever came into the possession of the present claimant. As soon as the theft was discovered the claimant promptly made good the loss. The Paymaster-General has given the opinion upon investigation that Mr. Calvert, the assistant in charge, was not to blame at all, and the Secretary of the Navy, under date October 11, 1883, says:

"The Department concurs in the opinion of the Paymaster-General that on a review of the whole case no charge of carelessness against Mr. Calvert in connection with the loss of the money is sustained."

Your committee are likewise of this opinion, and recommend that the bill (H. R. 4273) for the relief of the said Madison R. Calvert be passed by the House.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT ON LABOR IN EUROPE.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yesterday, under the direction of the Committee on Printing, I reported favorably a concurrent resolution having reference to the printing of the letter of the Secretary of State, with the accompanying reports of United States consuls, on labor in Europe. I then asked for its consideration, but it went over on objection. By direction of the committee I have, without changing the number of copies to be printed, increased the number to be distributed by Congress and lessened the number to be distributed through the State Department. It seems to be important that this matter should be considered and acted upon. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the letter of the Secretary of State, dated December 12, 1884, and the accompanying reports of United States consuls, on labor in Europe, be printed, and that 1,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives; and for the use of the Department of State 5,000 copies, and 10,000 copies of the Secretary's letter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The resolution is before the Senate, and the Senator from Nebraska, by direction of the Committee on Printing, moves sundry amendments to the resolution, which will be announced in their order.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 7 the committee propose to strike out "1,000" and insert "1,500;" so as to read:

And that 1,500 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 9, to strike out "2,000" and insert "2,500;" so as to read:

Two thousand five hundred copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 12, to strike out "5,000" and insert "4,000;" so as to read:

And for the use of the Department of State 4,000 copies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert, at the end of line 12, the word "additional;" so as to read:

And 10,000 additional copies of the Secretary's letter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the resolution:

Of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 for the House of Representatives, and 6,000 for the use of the Department of State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the letter of the Secretary of State dated December 12, 1884, and the accompanying reports of United States consuls on labor in Europe, be printed; and that 1,500 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate, 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives; and for the use of the Department of State 4,000 copies; and 10,000 additional copies of the Secretary's letter, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 for the House of Representatives, and 6,000 for the use of the Department of State.

FORT ROBINSON MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. HAMPTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7329) granting right of way to the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad Company across the Fort Robinson military reservation, in the State of Nebraska, to report it favorably. As it is a matter of some consequence that action should be taken upon the bill immediately, and as it involves no disputed question, I ask consent that it may be considered now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. If it requires no debate I shall not object.

Mr. SAWYER. Is there a letter from the Secretary of War approving it?

Mr. HAMPTON. There is. I ask for the reading of the letter of the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will read the letter of the Secretary of War.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, January 13, 1885.

SIR: In reply to your communication of January 12, instant, asking an expression of my views upon House bill 7329, granting a right of way specified in the bill across the Fort Robinson military reservation, I have the honor to advise you that there is no objection to the passage of the bill, containing as it does a provision that the right of way shall not interfere with any buildings or improvements on the reservation, and that the location of the railroad shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

The bill inclosed with your letter is herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRISON,
Acting Chairman of Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It grants to the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the State of Nebraska, the right of way, one hundred feet in width, for their railroad, across and through the Fort Robinson military reservation, located in the State of Nebraska, not to interfere with any buildings or improvements thereon, and the location thereof to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RETIRED GENERAL OF THE ARMY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The order of resolutions being gone through with, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2530) to authorize an additional appointment on the retired-list of the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. It will be read at length.

The bill was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the bill. I do not think it necessary, but to make it perfectly clear I move, after the word "person," in line 8, to insert the words "with the rank and full pay of such general or general-in-chief, as the case may be."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I desire to record my vote against the bill, not knowing whether the yeas and nays will be called upon its passage or not. I think there is neither justice nor propriety in it. The retired-list of the Army was created expressly for officers of the Army in the service who, by reason of age or disabilities incident to the service, have become unfit for that service and must either be discharged from the Army or must continue in the Army, an incubus and burden to it, and drawing their full pay, or be in some other manner provided for. We have provided the retired-list for those persons, and with my consent no one occupying a civil position, no matter what military position he may have heretofore occupied, shall ever be placed upon that retired-list. It is not the place for persons who are not in the Army and serving in the line of duty, and I think there is no reason for this proposed action.

It is perfectly understood what is the object of the bill, as it was avowed by the Senator from Vermont yesterday. It is to place a distinguished American citizen and soldier, General Grant, upon the retired-list, who is now, as the public press informs us, drawing annually the small sum of $15,000, which the average American citizen will believe is a sufficient amount to support any American citizen in comfort.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I agree with the policy that my distinguished friend from Missouri has stated, that it is not good policy as a rule to place private citizens on the retired-list of the Army, or to give them pensions, or to do anything for them that we do not do for all private citizens. I am a democrat of democrats on that point; and yet as one citizen of the United States and one Senator of the Senate of the United States I am glad to have the opportunity to urge the passage of this bill.

General Grant was educated at West Point. He served his country faithfully and gallantly in the Mexican war while a young lieutenant; I believe that was his rank at that time. He became General of the armies of the United States on an occasion of very considerable importance and interest. I state it mildly in order not to excite the temperament of anybody on either side of the Chamber. He was removed from the office of General of the armies of the United States from which he would have been retired when he reached the proper age and put on this very list, to assume again command of the armies of the United States as Commander-in-Chief under its Constitution. He did not seek it; he obeyed the call of duty. That removed him from the technical place that he held in the Army as an officer of it to a higher place, as the constitutional commander of it instead of the commander of it under the law. When his term expired he became, it is true, a private citizen.

In that state of the case, with the circumstances that we know and with the honor and the respect and the gratitude and the duty that we owe to him as primus inter illustres in the history of this country, I should be glad to have a unanimous vote in favor of the passage of this bill. I hope I shall get very nearly it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MAXEY. The yeas and nays having been called for, I wish to say a few words before the vote is taken.

I once opposed a measure of this kind because then General Grant was in a position pecuniarily which placed him beyond the necessity of aid from the Government. I was not willing to break over the rule which we had adopted, and which I believe to be right, of not taking civilians and putting them on the retired-list. But there have been great and recent changes in the worldly affairs of General Grant as we all know. By the misfortunes of business all the fortune that General Grant possessed has been swept away. It was sudden and to him, as we believe, startling and unexpected. A movement was made—inaugurated by General Sherman, honorable to that gentleman—to raise a sum to relieve General Grant of his embarrassment. General Grant declined that. Subsequently, a proposition was made by Mr. Vanderbilt to Mrs. Grant to relieve General Grant of his indebtedness of $150,000 to him. That was declined by General Grant and also by Mrs. Grant. In the mean time he has suffered greatly from a fall which threatens to cripple him for life. Now this is the condition. All of us know that a President of the United States many years ago of extraordinary popularity was in his old age reduced almost to poverty, being dependent upon his relations for support. It did not speak well for the American people. All felt that it was not right, and I do not doubt that had Congress made ample provision for President Monroe, as we have since done for Mrs. Polk, Mrs. Tyler, and Mrs. Garfield, the manly, generous American people would have applauded the act.

Now, Mr. President, as a Southern man, one who to the extent of his ability aided the confederacy while General Grant led the armies of the Union, I do but justice to General Grant when I say that when the supreme hour came with the Southern States, when we had to abandon all hope and yield up everything save honor, no man in the wide world ever acted with more magnanimity and generosity than Ulysses S. Grant did at Appomattox. I remember that, and it is remembered by the people among whom I live, who sympathize with him in his misfortunes; and I do not believe there is a man in the South who would begrudge a reasonable and fair support for him during his declining years. It is for these reasons I vote for the bill, and I add that whatever others may think—having known that man for forty-odd years—I do not believe that in any possible or conceivable way he was blamable for the stupendous failure of Grant & Ward in New York save and except that he put too much confidence in others and left to others what he had better have done himself; it is simply because of his well-known supreme confidence in friends that he was led to his financial ruin.

So looking at these matters, Mr. President, for one I shall vote for the bill offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, it may be that the form of this bill does not commend itself altogether to my judgment, but the purpose of the bill does. I respect the military character of General Grant, and I sympathize with the people of the country who desire to testify their appreciation of his services. I feel, therefore, that it is incumbent upon me as a Senator from Louisiana to vote for this bill as an evidence on the part of the people of that State of their good-will as well as of their manly sympathy for General Grant himself.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, in the late unhappy conflict I was with my section; I belonged to the vanquished party; I desired at one time that the Union should be dissolved; I voted for the secession of the State of Mississippi. I tried to make that declaration good by all the means in my power. I deplored the loss of the cause to which I was attached. The Union has been restored. I am now here a Senator from Mississippi in a restored Union. I determined when I took my seat on this floor that on all questions of mere sentiment connected with the late civil strife not adverse to the honor or substantial interest of the people whom I represent I would vote exactly as if I had been a Union man during the war. I believe the people of this country who were in favor of the war for the Union, who prosecuted the war, and who triumphed in the war desire to give this testimonial to their great leader, and, believing so, I shall give my vote to that end.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, when a bill was reported here some two years ago to put General Grant upon the retired-list of the Army I voted against it and gave my reasons for so doing. General Grant was then in the full enjoyment of honors and of wealth. The bill proposed to take him as a citizen and restore him to the Army; it proposed to reward him, not for his great services to the country in time of war, but, as it appeared to me, for such services as he had rendered in civil office. I disapproved of his conduct as a civilian, and I would not give my vote to reward him; but I said on that occasion that if the time should ever come when the great soldier to whom the people of this country I admitted owed so much for his military services should need the aid of this people, to be accorded to him through legislation by Congress, it would be my pleasure to vote for any bill to give him the needed aid and assistance.

General Grant has fallen into misfortune, whether through his own fault and negligence or otherwise I care not now to inquire. It appears he is in distressed circumstances. It is the duty of the people of this country to provide for him. I shall therefore vote for this bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, when a measure similar to this was before the Senate a few years ago I think I was one of three on this side of the Chamber who voted for that bill. I did so feeling that I was discharging my duty in the matter, without regard to the pecuniary condition of this man. I did not put it on the ground of his poverty or his wealth. I said so very distinctly in the few remarks that I then addressed to the Senate. Having voted that way at that time, I shall certainly not contradict myself and vote contrary to my former vote.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I intend to vote for this bill, and would have preferred to do so without a word, but for the remarks that fell from the Senator from Missouri.

A statement that a man is in receipt of an income of $15,000 a year will have its effect on the public mind. The true state of facts, however, in regard to General Grant do not justify such a statement applied to him. He is not worth a dollar in property; everything is swept away, and he is in a condition never to own property because of the enormous losses occasioned by the failure of the firm of which he was a member. The trust fund heretofore raised for him is invested in railroad stocks, the interest on which is guaranteed for a certain number of years, and at the end of that time that fund will be of little, if of any, value. Therefore he is virtually destitute of property and will soon be without support.

Aside from considerations of this kind, however, there are others which have caused me to look with favor on a proposition to place General Grant on the retired-list of the Army. And were I a Southern man as I am a Northern and a Western man, I would embrace it with even more favor than I ever have heretofore. I was here in this Capitol when a good many on this side of the Chamber were not, and I well remember when Edwin M. Stanton proposed to arrest and imprison General Robert E. Lee after the surrender at Appomattox that General Grant interposed General Lee's parole as a prisoner of war, and said he should not be touched, nor a hair of his head harmed. This was General Lee's protection and it availed him in the hour of distress and danger.

General Grant has shown higher courage in civil life than even upon the battlefield. The one instance I have mentioned is supplemented by another that has fallen under the observation of all of us. Perhaps the other side of the Chamber will not approve what I now say, but when General Grant became convinced within the last two years that a great act of cruel injustice had been done to a brother Army officer in the person of General Porter, how fearless, how prompt, how courageous was his action!

I will not dwell upon these things, however, or be betrayed into any extended remarks. I rose wholly for the purpose of dissipating the idea which the remarks of the Senator from Missouri will impress upon the public mind, that General Grant is provided for now. He is not, and it is becoming this Government that he should be, and I know no better way than by the measure proposed by the Senator from Vermont. It interferes with the rights of no one, and the great heart of the country will not complain that General Grant's old age is put beyond the reach of want.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator please state when the guarantee expires?

Mr. VOORHEES. I will.

Mr. COCKRELL. I made a statement, and it is mathematically and morally correct. He is drawing now $15,000 a year. There is no mistake about that.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is true, but the sufficiency of that income depends on its duration. I think it is now about four years—if some Senator has a better recollection than mine I should be glad if he would interpose it—since his friends in New York raised the fund to which we are alluding. If I am correct in that, then there is yet about six years' duration to this income. This fund was invested in certain railroad stocks, and the interest at a certain rate on them was guaranteed by Governor Morgan and then by his estate for ten years. Four or five of those years have passed away, and when the last of them expires the reliability of that income will be destroyed. These stocks are now greatly depreciated, and they will never constitute a safe source of income nor a safe reliance for support.

Mr. COCKRELL. The generation then living will administer the affairs of this Government and do equal and exact justice to all its citizens.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GROOME (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER], and hence withhold my vote.

Mr. CULLOM (when Mr. LOGAN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. LOGAN] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL]. If he were here, I am sure my colleague would vote for this bill.

Mr. LAPHAM (when the name of Mr. MILLER, of New York, was called). I desire to say that my colleague is paired, but I can assure the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] that my colleague if he were here would vote for the bill.

Mr. GROOME. I have no doubt about it, but I withhold my vote.

Mr. INGALLS (when Mr. PLUMB'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PLUMB] is detained to-day by illness. He is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the affirmative). The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is absent to-day, and I agreed to pair with him on political questions. I do not know how he would vote upon this question, and therefore perhaps I should withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think this can be regarded as a political question in any case.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; with that explanation I shall allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 9; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. VEST subsequently said: I was unfortunately absent from the Senate this morning when the vote was taken on the bill placing General Grant on the retired-list, and I understand that the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] announced a pair between the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] and his colleague [Mr. PLUMB]. That is a mistake. The pair was between the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and myself. I suppose probably the Senator from North Carolina would have voted for the bill, as he had voted for its passage before. I should have voted against it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] requested me this morning to obtain a pair for his colleague [Mr. PLUMB], the latter being confined to his house by sickness. I did not at that time recollect that there was a standing pair between the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], though I had known that such a general understanding did exist, and thereupon, with the consent of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], I did arrange a pair between his colleague [Mr. RANSOM] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. The mistake arose as I have stated.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, returned to the Senate, agreeably to its request, the bill (S. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Lucy Le G. Jeffers.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 3661) granting an increase of pension to Lucy Le G. Jeffers; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HALE. I move to take up the House bill making appropriations for the service of the Navy Department for the residue of the current fiscal year.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7874) making additional appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first or formal reading of the bill, and that it then be read for amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE). The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent to dispense with the formal reading of the bill, and that it may be read for amendment clause by clause. The Chair hears no objection.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, line 14, to strike out "ninety-five" and insert "one hundred and ninety-three;" so as to read:

One hundred and ninety-three ensigns.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 15, to strike out "ninety-eight junior ensigns."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 59, after the word "orders," to strike out "and for traveling expenses of apothecaries, yeomen, and civilian employés;" so as to read:

Mileage to officers while traveling under orders in the United States, and for actual personal expenses of officers while traveling abroad under orders, and for actual and necessary traveling expenses of naval cadets while proceeding from their homes to the Naval Academy for examination and appointment as cadets, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, in the appropriations for "Bureau of Provisions and Clothing," after the word "dollars," in line 242, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That all enlisted men and boys in the Navy, attached to any United States vessel or station and doing duty thereon, and naval cadets, shall be allowed a ration, or commutation thereof in money, under such limitations and regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, in the appropriations for "Bureau of Construction and Repair," in line 269, after the word "exceed," to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship when the estimated cost of such repairs, to be appraised by a competent board of naval officers, shall exceed 20 per cent. of the estimated cost, appraised in like manner, of a new ship of the same size and like material.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, in the appropriations for the "Bureau of Steam-Engineering," in line 297, before the words "per centum," to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

Provided, That no part of said sum shall be applied to the repair of engines and machinery of wooden ships where the estimated costs of such repair shall exceed 20 per cent. of the estimated cost of new engines and machinery of the same character and power.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section and clause, after the word "power," in line 298, to insert—

But nothing herein contained shall prevent the repair or building of boilers for wooden ships the hulls of which can be fully repaired for 20 per cent. of the estimated cost of a new ship of the same size and material.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to line 314. Should not the word "other" have an "s" added to it?

Mr. HALE. Yes; so as to read:

For pay of professors and others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made unless there be objection. The Chair would also inquire if there should not be a comma after the word "stores," in line 281; so as to read:

Purchase and preservation of all materials and stores, purchase and repair of machinery, &c.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be so amended if no objection be made.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, in the appropriations for the "Naval Academy," before the word "library," in line 355, to strike out "reception-rooms" and insert "recitation-rooms."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to line 402.

Mr. HALE. The word "constructed" should be "construed."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in section 1, in the appropriations for the Marine Corps, after the word "dollars," at the end of line 435, to strike out the following clause:

And from and after the passage of this act there shall be no appointments, except by promotion, to fill vacancies occurring in the list of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps until the number of such officers shall have been reduced, by casualties or otherwise, below seventy-five; and after the number of officers shall be reduced as above provided, the whole number of commissioned officers on the active-list in the Marine Corps shall not exceed seventy-five.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 4, in the following words:

SEC. 4. That no officer whose name is borne on the retired-list of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps shall hold position in the civil service or other employment of the Government, and draw the salary or compensation thereof together with his pay as a retired officer of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps: Provided, That any such retired officer accepting a position in the civil service or other employment of the Government may, at the time of acceptance, elect to take the salary of such position or in lieu to retain his pay as a retired officer: Provided further, That the restrictions of this section shall not apply to any officer below the rank of major in the Army or Marine Corps, or commander in the Navy, who has been retired by reason of wounds received in service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

LUCY LE G. JEFFERS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (S. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Lucy Le G. Jeffers, has been returned from the House of Representatives in accordance with the request of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent to have the vote of the Senate heretofore taken upon the passage of that bill reconsidered, so that the bill may be indefinitely postponed. Both Houses have passed a bill, which is on your table, I believe, ready for the signature of the presiding officer, so that the bill referred to by the Chair is not needed. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the Senate bill was passed heretofore, and then I shall ask that it be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator moves a reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Lucy Le G. Jeffers. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion to reconsider is agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. Now I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

FORFEITURE OF MICHIGAN LAND GRANT.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to call up Order of Business 934, being the bill (S. 2363) to declare a forfeiture of a land grant to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad.

I wish to make a motion to recommit that bill to the Committee on Public Lands, and, in support of it, I beg the Senate to indulge me in saying that I made the report of this bill on the 4th of July last, about the time we were breaking up our session here. I find, upon an examination of it, that the description of the railroad and the application of this forfeiture to it is entirely inaccurate. This bill, as reported here, does not express the views of the committee. The committee did not intend to forfeit the entire land grant, but only so much of it as is called unearned land, but the bill as reported does forfeit the entire land grant, there having been ninety miles of excellent road built, on which there are large towns and a number of villages, and where all the lands within the limits, I believe, have been disposed of. I ask, therefore, that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take up, out of order, the bill (S. 2363) to declare a forfeiture of a land grant to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill is before the Senate, and the Senator from Alabama now moves that it be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF CHILDREN.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 729. The only purpose of asking it is to move to disagree to the House amendments and have a committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 729) for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, now on the President's table. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I move that the Senate disagree to the House amendments and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. It is suggested by the Committee on the District of Columbia that I make that request.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Had not the amendments better be read, so that we may know what we are acting on?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I can explain in less time than it will take to read them. One is to strike out the words "within their view" and insert "in their presence," and the other is to strike out "21" and insert "16," so as to make it apply to those of 16 years. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the PRESIDENT pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. RIDDLEBERGER, PIKE, and BROWN were appointed.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the regular order will now be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE). The unfinished business will now be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER], proposed in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. SLATER. At the proper time I shall ask unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw that amendment; but before that I desire to offer an amendment to the text of the bill. In line 14 of section 4 of the bill, after the word "class," I move to insert:

Or shall charge, or receive, any greater compensation for transporting a similar amount and kind of property a shorter distance than for a longer distance over the same line of road and in the same direction.

Mr. SLATER. Under the system of charging a larger price for a short haul than for a longer haul there have grown up greater abuses in the Western and Pacific States than under any other particular feature of the transportation system; and the amendment proposes to make it unlawful and to prohibit the charging of a greater price for transporting freight a shorter distance than similar freight of the same quantity a longer distance on the same line of road and in the same direction.

To illustrate the evil at which this amendment is intended to strike, I will refer to an instance brought to my attention by a constituent living in my own county. Soon after the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad a combination was made with the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, making a through line. A merchant in my county desired to transport hardware from Chicago, I think it was, westward to a point on the Blue Mountains, known as Lincoln Station, a distance probably one hundred miles shorter than from Chicago to the city of Portland. He was asked $200 to send the freight to Portland and then ship it back some three hundred miles, or nearly that, to the point where he desired it; but if he shipped it direct to the point he desired to ship it he was asked $400. In other words, he was asked $400 for shipping a car-load of freight something like one hundred miles less distance than if he sent it direct to Portland. So it is on all the Pacific roads, as I understand, and it is so largely in all the Western States on other lines; the charges to any given central point are at certain rates per ton; and if a party ships on the same line of road in the direction of the central point, for instance Portland, not wishing to ship all the way to the central point, but to stop off one or two hundred miles short of that point, he is charged the through rates and in addition the local rates back to the point where he desires his freight to go. Hence, men are compelled to ship their freight one hundred, two hundred, or three hundred miles farther than they want it to go, and then back again to the point where they desire it to stop, paying the through freight and then the local freight back.

It is to cure this evil that this amendment is intended; and I think it will affect and reach a greater amount of discrimination that is now practiced by railroad companies than any one proposition that can be brought to the attention of the Senate and incorporated in this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not propose to take up the time of the Senate further than to say that the proposition offered by the Senator from Oregon is a very important one, and one of the vital questions of difference between the House bill and the bill now under consideration. So far as I am concerned I think it would be very seriously detrimental to the business of this country, and especially of the Northwest, that such an amendment should be attached to any bill we may pass.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Why, Mr. President, it seems to me if the statement of the Senator from Oregon is correct as to the practice which obtains on the road to which he refers there certainly can be no objection to putting on the amendment if the principle of the bill is in itself right.

My difficulty has been in considering this measure to know in the first place whether Congress has any power to do this; whether it has any right or authority to take charge of and regulate the tolls and charges upon railroads that are incorporated by State authority and which do not owe their existence to the National Government. That is one of the objections which have been pressing upon my mind. I am satisfied that there are many grave outrages perpetrated by these corporations on the people, and I would be very glad to correct, as far as I can, any of them. But if this bill is correct in principle, then the amendment of the Senator from Oregon most unquestionably is correct. If a railroad company for the same amount of freight, a car-load of freight, charges a less price for a long haul than it does for a short haul there is no justice, there is no equity in it; and if Congress has the power to deal with the question at all I think the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is eminently proper and right. I shall vote for that amendment, without, however, committing myself to the support of the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment reported again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. SLATER.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I was at a loss to understand the force of the objection of the Senator from Illinois in charge of this bill, that the amendment would defeat the purpose and object of the bill we now have under consideration. I supposed the practice prohibited by the amendment was one of the evils which were sought to be rectified by this legislation in some way.

The case given by the Senator from Oregon is paralleled by very many cases on all the Pacific railways. The Central Pacific has done this very thing for years, and now the Northern Pacific is doing precisely the same thing. In the case of a car-load shipped from New York city to San Francisco, where these roads have absolute control of the designating of the through rates, the through rate is fixed from New York to San Francisco, and if a car stops six hundred miles east of San Francisco, precisely the same thing is done with that as is done by the Northern Pacific Railroad, and this has been going on for years. For instance, $300 is the through rate to San Francisco from New York city; and if a car stops six hundred miles this side of San Francisco it is charged $300, the through rate to San Francisco, though it is carried six hundred miles less distance. That, in all conscience, ought to be sufficient; that is discrimination enough against a town or city or business man who lives six hundred miles east of San Francisco, that he is compelled to pay precisely the same rate of freight as a man in San Francisco six hundred miles beyond. But they do not stop there. Not only do they charge a man $300 for his car-load, but they charge also the local freight back from San Francisco six hundred miles east. The local freight is $500. So the man who lives six hundred miles this side of San Francisco is actually punished by being compelled to pay not only the rate which the San Francisco merchant pays, but $500 more.

That mere statement ought to be enough to condemn the practice. Could anything more call for the interposition of legislation than that statement? When the Northern Pacific Railroad was finished it was to be a competing road, we were told. We have been amused, Congress and the American people have been amused, by the statement that these were competing roads; and yet after this Government had given millions of acres of land to build a competing road, its managers come in and exercise precisely the same acts of tyranny, of despotism and outrage upon the people living along the line of the road, and in the end they make a combination to keep up the through rates. The Central Pacific, which was supposed to be in competition with the water ways around the cape, actually made a combination, and pays out the proceeds of its earnings to the Pacific Mail Steamship line. When the Northern Pacific comes in competition, it is said that it actually contributes a proportion—what was supposed to be between the railroads an equitable proportion—of money to pay the bonus given to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company!

I merely allude to that in connection with the allegation that these are competing roads. But here is an acknowledged evil. My friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] says it is an acknowledged evil. I presume nobody will pretend that it is not an evil which should be met; and how are we to meet it except by such an amendment as is proposed by the Senator from Oregon? We can scarcely conceive, I take it, any sort of justice in tolerating a railroad corporation which exercises that despotism anywhere within the length and breadth of this country.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Nebraska says he is unable to see what I mean by opposing the amendment. I desire to say that the theory of the bill is not to undertake to legislate upon all points of difference that may exist between shippers and railroad men and to make a statute to fit every case. Upon the other hand, the theory of the bill is that we shall have a commission appointed who shall look into all these questions and ascertain whether the railroads are guilty of the charges that are made against them or not, and, if they are, to report to the Congress of the United States the facts and their view of such additional legislation as may be necessary in the premises.

So far as I am concerned I am not here to say that it is right that the Pacific railroads or any railroads shall charge more for a shorter distance than a longer one, or as much; but I am here to say that I do not believe it is wise, in the interest of the business of this country, to make an iron-bound law that will work possibly, I may say, at least, an injustice not only to the corporations of the country but to the business interests of the country as well.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon undertakes to specifically make it unlawful for a railroad under any circumstances to charge more for a short haul than it does for a long one. Such a law was some years ago enacted in the State of Illinois, which I have the honor in part to represent. It was almost exactly in the terms of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon. The supreme court of our State decided that the Legislature could not constitutionally make such a law—that there might be cases where a railroad would be justified in charging as much or more for a short haul than it did for a long one.

I have sought to get around these controverted questions, which are, to say the least, difficult for us here as legislators to decide upon, and to place the duty upon a commission to look into these questions and at a future Congress to report to us what the facts are and what the remedy ought to be in their judgment. In the mean time the bill provides against extortion, against unjust discrimination. There is an amendment prepared to be offered providing that discriminations shall apply as well to places as to persons; and with those declarations upon those broad principles we authorize a commission to be appointed and then wait for another Congress to see what they will have to say upon these questions about which Congress differs and about which the people of the country are differing.

So far as my State is concerned, for the city of Chicago, and I may say for the whole Western country, we could not afford to allow a provision of that kind to be incorporated in a bill if we could prevent it, because to-day flour is being shipped from Chicago to New York for a less sum than it costs a man who buys it in the market at New York to carry it from the depot to his residence in that city.

Whenever you touch the subject in such a way as to cripple the efforts of those corporations in transporting the freights of the country to the Eastern markets and from there on across the ocean, to that extent you affect injuriously the whole people of the country, not only the producers but the consumers as well. I desire in perfect good faith to so shape whatever law we may pass as to protect the people of this country from being imposed upon by the corporations of the country. I admit there is liability to the imposition mentioned in the amendment and that it is practiced upon the people; but while I am trying to curb the conduct of these corporations and protect the people, I do not want to do it in such a manner as to injure the people and possibly break down the corporations as well.

There is the difference between the bills that are before the Congress of the United States. One idea is to make a cast-iron law to fit every little instance of imposition that anybody knows about, and the other is to legislate upon some broader principle, and steer between the danger of injuring the people and of injuring the corporations of the country. My judgment is that the bill which the Committee on Railroads of the Senate has reported to this body is likely to work to the benefit of the public, and at the same time not cripple the corporations in any just operation that they are undertaking to carry out in the transaction of their business.

I might go on, and I am half inclined to go further in the discussion of this question, and show the difference between these two ideas or lines of legislation as proposed by the different Houses of Congress; but I shall desist from doing so at this time. I insist that if you ingraft such an amendment upon the bill you will injure hundreds and thousands of people who are the large consumers of the country, as well as the great agricultural West, who are trying to get their produce to the East so that they may get it into the markets of the world.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have heard a great many times of the dangers to the West from a provision in any law such as the Senator from Oregon proposes in his amendment, but as yet I have been unable to see how it could injuriously affect the section of country which the Senator from Illinois so ably represents. The Senator states how cheaply flour is carried from Chicago to New York city. Undoubtedly; but suppose the Pennsylvania or any other railroad running out of Chicago should carry a car-load of flour from Chicago to New York for $50 per car-load, and then undertake to charge $75 per car-load for carrying a car-load of flour from Chicago to some point in the State of Illinois twenty-five miles distant from Chicago?

Mr. CULLOM. I will answer the Senator. In the first place, the bill before the Senate declares against extortion and makes extortion a misdemeanor. Then it declares against unjust discrimination, and makes that a misdemeanor. If a corporation is guilty of either, at any place or at any time, it is liable to a prosecution under the law.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The bill speaks of extortion. Does it define it?

Mr. CULLOM. Look and see.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have read it. The bill speaks of discrimination. Does it define it? The Senator has not yet answered my question. We have been told that it would be injurious to the West if we should require a provision of this kind, and I have been industriously endeavoring to ascertain just where the hardship would come in to the section of country which the Senator and myself represent. I should again like to ask the Senator the question I propounded a moment ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska calls the attention of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will go on and make his speech I can reply when he concludes.

Mr. VAN WYCK. No; I am not making a speech. The time has not arrived for that. I am simply propounding a question. I only desire information. We have been threatened in the West, our Legislatures have been threatened, our people have been threatened, their representatives in the national Capitol have been threatened that if they dare put a provision in either of these bills which they believe to be right, then they are to suffer injury from it, and it is precisely upon that point that I wish information. I desire to know, it is important for me, it is important for the people whom I represent, as it is for the people whom the Senator represents, to know whether a provision of this kind in the proposed law is going to work a hardship upon them. The Senator says we could not get our grain to New York out of the West if we had a provision of this kind in the law. He states the fact that flour is carried so cheaply from Chicago to New York, and he asks if they shall not have the privilege of transporting flour at cheap rates from Chicago to New York. Certainly; but the Senator fails to answer my question. Suppose the rate for a car-load of flour from Chicago to New York is $50 and the same railroad corporation should carry a car-load of flour of the same weight from Chicago to some town or village in the State of Illinois twenty-five miles distant from the city of Chicago and should charge $75, while they carry a car-load of flour from Chicago to New York city for $50, will my friend tell me what he would say of that proposition? Will he explain that? If he will do so, it will help solve this problem in my mind.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, he has a way of getting the floor and cross-examining witnesses in the Senate, but I wish to say to him once for all that I think the fact that a railroad charges $75 a car for a shorter distance and $50 for a long one raises a presumption that the railroad is extorting from the man with whom the contract was made for the short haul, and would be unjustly discriminating against that man, and ought to be prosecuted for doing it. But there are circumstances surrounding these transactions whereby it might appear after all that there was neither extortion nor unjust discrimination. The Senator knows very well that there are a great many circumstances connected with the transaction of business in the transportation of freights that enter into the considerations which result in a contract, and that neither he nor I, with all the wisdom that we may think we possess upon the question, is able to determine whether the railroad is extorting or unjustly discriminating. The presumption is, as the supreme court of the State of Illinois decided, that if a corporation charges more for a short haul than for a long one, the corporation is extorting from the shipper, that it is unjustly discriminating against the shipper; and yet that supreme court decided that the mere fact that it was so was not absolute proof that it might be so, and that a law passed declaring it to be so would not stand in the courts of the country. Does the Senator want anything further on the subject?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am always pleased to hear from the Senator from Illinois, but I can not yet see that he has resolved the doubt. He says that it would be evidence that there was extortion, and yet when you come into court to establish the fact of extortion, under this law or any other, the attorney would rise and say that it was unjust to the people of the great West that a great public corporation should be controlled in what they were doing, because I understand the Senator here at one time to justify it and say that a thing may be necessary, that it may be proper, that there may be circumstances where it would be eminently proper for a railroad in justice to a great section of country to do this thing. Where would be the possibility of obtaining a conviction of extortion if it should prove to be true in the courts, as it is claimed to be true in Congress, that on the part of the railroad companies it may be a virtue, absolutely a virtue, it may be promoting the prosperity of this great country, or sections of it, that they should be allowed to exercise this power of discrimination? Where would be your indictments for extortion when the legitimate basis of crime is the intent to do wrong, when attorneys could go into court and say just what is said on the floor of the American Senate and in the House of Representatives, that it is a virtue and not a wrong? There can be no doubt upon that part of the proposition, I take it.

The Senator says that some Senators have been combating the extortions of railroad companies for ten years and we are at a loss to know what to do just at this juncture. He says we want a commission. A commission to ascertain what? Here is a statement of facts that is undisputed. My friend from Oregon has stated it, I have stated it in regard to the Central Pacific Railroad, and we say we can state it in regard to a number of other railroads. No one is here to dispute any of the facts stated. My friend from New Jersey would not do that. Nobody rises to defend them. I have not heard a state of facts whereby these things can be justified. That is all that is asked; and here is an attempt to mislead the public mind of the State my friend represents, that there is to be an injury worked to the great West when we seek to make a provision of this kind. No; there can not possibly be any injury there. We know it. I say to my friend that his people in Illinois and the people of my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and those of the State which I have the honor to represent, feel the exactions, the hardships, and the extortion of this outrage. I should be pleased if the Senator from Illinois, or any other Senator, would rise in his place and show us the beneficence of this exacting power of a railroad company. Will you show us where it has benefited a community, a State, a whole people, that a railroad company shall have the power to charge $800 for a car-load delivered six hundred miles east of San Francisco while it charges $300 for a car-load of the same merchandise delivered at San Francisco, six hundred miles beyond? The Senator's people have felt this discrimination in his State; they have felt it in the State of my friend from Iowa and in my own State. We know day after day of hardships repeated, long continued, by reason of these exactions, and until these gentlemen can show us where there is some beneficence arising from it we claim that we ought to meet the proposition. We have been grappling with it for ten years; these things have been suffered for longer than ten years by the American people, and now my friend says we must not do a little because we can not do it all. We have waited long enough. Let us do a little something by adopting the provision which my friend from Oregon suggests, and now and then another provision which may be suggested. Let us count this something in the direction, and not continue to make to ourselves obstacles, because, forsooth, there are many things which we ought to reach in the end.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I understand the pending proposition is to impose a penalty upon any railroad engaged in the transportation of merchandise from one State to another which shall demand or take any greater compensation in proportion (although that word is not in the amendment, but I understand that is the meaning of the amendment) for transporting any merchandise of the same amount and kind a shorter distance than it does for a longer distance over the same line of road and in the same direction.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will allow me to say that I do not understand the amendment to import the words the Senator from Massachusetts injects into it.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the author of the amendment to explain whether that is not the meaning. I will ask the Senator from Oregon what it does mean. Suppose, for instance, a railroad charges $100 for a certain amount and kind of merchandise transported a thousand miles, does he not mean to prohibit by this amendment the charging more than $50 for making the same transportation five hundred miles?

Mr. SLATER. No, sir; that is not the effect at all. I will state the object. Take as an illustration the cities of Chicago and New York. Suppose for transporting wheat from Chicago to New York over a through line of road that is bearing interstate commerce a charge of $50 per carload is made from Chicago to New York. One hundred miles east of Chicago there is another city where freight is received, and from there they charge $60 to New York. The effect of the amendment is to say that when they charge $100 for a car-load of wheat from Chicago to New York they shall not charge more than $100 from any point east of that to New York. They may charge all the way up to $100; it gives them that margin and discrimination; but they shall not charge more. Then all points east of Chicago to New York would be upon an equality with Chicago.

Mr. HOAR. And that entirely independent of the fact whether at the longer distance the cars go back full and whether from the point of the shorter distance they go back empty? It is entirely without regard to the question whether there are several competing routes at the longer distance that do not exist at the shorter.

Mr. SLATER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I now understand the Senator.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask that the amendment of the Senator from Oregon be read?

Mr. HOAR. I will send the amendment to the desk and have it read at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] will be again reported by the Chief Clerk.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is, in section 4, line 14, after the word "class," to insert:

Or shall charge or receive any greater compensation for transporting a similar amount and kind of property a shorter distance than for a longer distance over the same line of road and in the same direction.

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose to enter into a general discussion of the railroad policy, or even into a discussion of the problem in railroad administration upon which the pending amendment bears, but rather to state the present condition of my own mind upon the general subject. Some eight or ten years ago I had occasion to study as thoroughly and faithfully as I could at that time this problem. I lived in a city forty-five miles westward of Boston, a large and rapidly growing manufacturing city, making machinery of many kinds, and textile fabrics and boots and shoes, almost all of which had a market at the West, and it was dependent for its supplies of raw material and of food on the West and for its supplies of lumber on the North and Northeast. The evil which the Western communities that are growing so rapidly into life now complain of was complained of then. Our manufacturers had to compete with Boston and the cities in the immediate neighborhood of Boston, and had to pay a larger sum to have their freights, their food, and supplies of material brought from the West stop at Worcester than in many cases they would pay if they were carried clear through Worcester, forty-five miles west of Boston, and brought back again over the same road forty-five miles at the local rate. Our manufacturers used to pack their machinery, send it to Boston, bill it to the West from Boston, and look out of the windows of their manufacturing establishments and see it go by westward on its way from a point forty-five miles east, having that extra ninety miles of transportation.

I thought then that a measure of this kind was required, and wrote a letter to my constituents urging the taking up this railroad policy and establishing the principle which is now sought to be established here. Just about the same time we also chartered a railroad running to the north out of our city on the principle that the stock should be owned by the various towns through which it passed, the idea being that each town owning a share of the stock would be represented in the direction, and that would compel the management of the railroad with reference to local convenience. They would run trains out of the city on which workingmen living in the country could go in and out. I suppose most of the people in that community, who had the exact and only the exact interest which is represented by the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Oregon, were in favor of both those schemes regulating the imposition of railroad freights and the price of freights by law, so that in all cases the shorter freights should pay no more than the longer, and giving to the communities through which the road passed a voice and control in the management of the road, a semi-political control.

I have to say now that I believe that entire community, having no interest but a business interest, having very little interest as owners of railroads, having no business interest but that which the Senators who advocate this legislation represent here, has changed its mind. The road which we committed to the local management has been the least fortunate of the six or seven roads which run out of that city, and it has been able on the whole to give the least accommodation to the public. The Boston and Albany Railroad, of which we complained, being a profitable and successful road, has by reason of its success and the profit of its administration been constantly increasing for the local communities through which it passes railroad facilities, and has been constantly diminishing its prices. We are now probably as well accommodated a city with railroad facilities as exists on the continent, and it has been due not to the policy which I have described; but the laws of business and trade induced the railroads which passed there by a regard to their own interests operating through a series of years to find their account in developing the local interests by increasing the local conveniences and advantages. That has been done, let me say further, under the control and influence of a Massachusetts board of railroad commissioners. The State of Massachusetts established some twelve or fifteen years ago, about the time I speak of, a board of railroad commissioners. It gave them no judicial authority whatever. Perhaps some trifling matters have been added more recently; but when that commission was established it was established simply without giving the board any power to make or enforce a decree, but they were simply authorized to inquire into the administration of any railroad or of all railroads in the State, to hear every local or individual complaint, and to report their judgment to the Legislature from time to time, so that any complaint well founded might be redressed by the Legislature if the board of railroad commissioners should recommend it. I believe in no instance has there been a resistance to a recommendation of that board by the railroads concerned so that the authority of the Legislature has been necessarily invoked.

Under that system the railroad administration of Massachusetts has most marvelously and wonderfully improved. My belief, and I think I state the belief of the business men who, as I said, have the same interests that the Senator from Oregon represents, is that you can not undertake to regulate or control the railroads of this country successfully by undertaking to interfere with the ordinary laws of business or the ordinary laws of supply and demand by what my friend from Illinois speaks of as cast-iron legislation. The first thing to be done is to let the daylight into every one of their transactions, to see that nothing is done by a railroad company in dealing with the community or in dealing with any locality or individual which is not absolutely known to all mankind, so that the power of public sentiment will come in; in the next place, to have the railroads subjected to a most rigid and strict accountability in the matter of having their stock represent the actual cost of the road and no factitious cost by reason of watering stock; and in the third place, which is, perhaps, merely another way of stating the first proposition that I made, to require of them as simple, exact, and clear system of keeping accounts as possible, and to compel their accounts to be submitted to the scrutiny of the public and to the scrutiny of some public authority.

I believe that with those three principles in operation the railroad system of the United States will be improved as the railroad system of Massachusetts has been improved. I believe that these attempts to prescribe exact laws which are to interfere with the contract between the railroad and the freighter and shipper will fail. We have had in Massachusetts one or two. There is a short-haul law on our statute-book now, but it was so drawn that it never accomplished any useful purpose. I do not think any railroad was ever held under it.

Mr. COKE. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he believes it possible that a commission of five individuals can supervise the railroad system of the United States as a similar commission could supervise the railroad system of the State of Massachusetts? I ask him if it would be possible for a railroad commission to hear and intelligently determine all the complaints against railroads throughout the entire country?

Mr. HOAR. Of course the railroad commission appointed by the National Government could not deal with interstate commerce carried on by rail with that minuteness of oversight and inspection which the commission of a small State of 1,700,000 or 1,800,000 inhabitants would, a State so small in territory as that of Massachusetts, although we have a very large number of miles of railroad, as the Senator knows. But I think practically they could deal with the system. They could deal with the system of freights, fares, and charges which was administered by any railroad. They could report whether there were reasonable or unreasonable discriminations practiced. I believe that a railroad commission such as is proposed in the original bill here would very largely cure this evil.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Right there, if the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, he has expressed his view from a large experience in the matter we are discussing at this moment in regard to the subject of long hauls and short hauls. Does he think from the experience he has had in the last few years that any commission, whatever they might report in regard to that matter, would change or affect his judgment of the propriety of the thing?

Mr. HOAR. It would depend upon who the commissioners were and what they said. If the commissioners were men who talked wildly and rashly and heatedly, not looking for justice, they would not have any effect; but if the commissioners made a grave and serious argument, such as my honorable friend from Nebraska would make if he were on the commission, I have no doubt my judgment would be affected very much and my mind might be changed.

Mr. SLATER. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] seems to be very much concerned as to the effect of the amendment upon the movement of the products of the West eastward. I think a moment's reflection will show him and any other Senator who is cognizant of the situation that that could not possibly be so. The great freights moving from the West to the East are controlled by laws and markets not entirely within the United States. They are controlled by the prices of commodities in other countries, and the shipments are controlled by the prices that these commodities can command for export at New York to Liverpool or some other foreign market. Hence the rate of freight is limited and put in such a form as will facilitate the movement of the wheat and the flour of the West to New York for the export trade.

But the great and marked effect of the amendment will be upon the westward-bound trade, and its influence will be felt and the opposition will come from the great central cities of the West. It will tend to build up many small towns that are now tributary to the great cities of the West, as Chicago, Saint Louis, Kansas City, and other places. I am one of those who believe that the prosperity of this country will be better served, its interests further advanced, by such a system of railroad control as will induce the building up of one hundred cities or towns of 10,000 population each, instead of building up one city of 100,000 population. The tendency of the United States is to centralization. The effect of the amendment will be to a very large extent to decentralize population, and will make many localities instead of a few localities that will prosper by trade and commerce.

The effect upon the Pacific States and Territories is far beyond what will ever be felt by any of the so-called Western States; for six, seven, or eight hundred miles eastward of San Francisco and eastward of the city of Portland the effect of the present rates is to make all towns, all localities, all manufactures, all business tributary to those centers, and this is what we object to. The people must either go to San Francisco or to Portland for all their merchandise, and as everything of that kind must necessarily come from the East, they must pay for the transportation right by their doors of the very merchandise they need upon their counters, the very machinery they need in their mills or upon their farms, two, three, four, five, six hundred miles, and await its return and pay the local freights back in addition to the through freights.

It will not do to say that the great through lines can not subsist without this system, because it does not increase the rate of the through line. It is proposed to allow the through line to charge as much for a short distance as it does for a longer distance on the same line of road and in the same direction and at the same time; but it is because an effort is made to build up centers, because it is intended to give an unnatural growth to particular localities, because it is intended to enrich one locality at the expense of many other localities, because in fact it is intended by this system to build up particular lines of local transfer at the expense of the people who reside upon the lines of local transfer. The effect of that, as I have said, is to build up a few great commercial centers at the expense and to the detriment of all interior portions of the particular section and vicinity of these centers, to dwarf the smaller interior towns and absorb them in the larger seaport towns, and this is the reason why it is generally objected to.

The case I have instanced, immediately after the completion of the North Pacific, its combination with the Oregon system, is an illustration and a fair one. They proposed to charge the merchant who desired to conduct business in an interior town four hundred miles for transporting one car-load of freight one hundred miles less in distance when he could have sent it to the city of Portland for $200, and then must probably pay $200 or $300 to have it go back to the point where he wanted it. The purpose and effect was to compel the man to purchase his merchandise in the city of Portland. The purpose of it was to make him contribute of his business, of his accumulation, of the wealth that he would create, to sustain the city of Portland. So it is upon the Central Pacific and all the other Pacific lines reaching out to the Pacific coast. As soon as the Northern Pacific was completed it was pooled with the Central Pacific and the Southern Pacific, so that we received no benefit whatever from it as a competing line.

The railroads completely destroy competition; and where there can be no competition I say it is the province of Congress to step in and fix the rule and the extent of discrimination, and this is the purpose of the amendment. The bill is very properly worded, and says, "if there is unjust discrimination;" and the amendment proposes to point out and make emphatic a class of elements that can be introduced into court to show that there is unjust discrimination. It proposes that if there shall be charged on an interstate line for hauling a given amount of freight of the same class and amount on the same line of road and in the same direction at the same time a greater price for a shorter haul than a longer one, that shall constitute an unjust discrimination. There is more to be effected, there are greater evils to be eradicated by the amendment than all the other provisions of the bill can possibly effectuate in any direction whatever.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator says "at the same time." I observe there is nothing in his amendment in relation to the time.

Mr. SLATER. That will be the effect of it. Of course that is understood. It is true, as far as the mere verbal wording of the amendment is concerned, it does not express "the same time," but that is a necessary part of it.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon a question for information. The complaint, as I understand it, made by the Senator, and in short a majority of the complaints with respect to these extortions, come from the West on the line of the Pacific railroads, roads chartered by the United States Government. Extensive land grants have been given them to aid in the construction of the roads in order that the public benefit of having those roads might be received by the people. What is there to hinder the Government from so amending the charters of the so-called Pacific railroads as to compel them to charge reasonable rates and not to discriminate as to distance? Why does the Senator make his amendment applicable to all railroads in the country when it is averred by nine-tenths of all the railroads that such a provision means universal bankruptcy to the railroad system? I am not taking that side of the question; I am not committing myself to either of the bills. I only present and ask the Senator for an answer to that question. Why does he not propose to so amend the charters of the Pacific railroads under which these extortions are practiced, and from which quarters complaints have mainly come, they being roads of the United States Government? Why not compel them to accept reasonable and fair rates either for long or for short distances?

Mr. SLATER. The answer is a very easy one. We are now proposing to put upon the statute-book a statute controlling and regulating interstate commerce. When the railroad grants referred to by the Senator were made provisions of that character were not incorporated in the grants, and now when we come to legislate for the entire United States for interstate freight or traffic passing over other lines, as well as land-grant lines, it would be a strange exception to except land-grant roads, and it would be perhaps as strenuously fought if we were to attempt to amend their charters; it would lead to a long litigation in all probability, contesting the right of Congress to put amendments of that character upon the charters after the roads had been built and gone into operation. We are now dealing with the subject with which these roads are connected, as well as all other interstate roads and interstate lines of communication, and it is proper that this provision should be incorporated in this bill.

I do not apprehend that this provision will be ruinous to the railroad lines by any means. It may cause them to readjust their methods of business, it may cause them to readjust their scales of prices, it may compel them to charge greater prices to some places than they have been charging formerly in order to run out some other line of communication; it may do all that, but it is not going to produce insolvency in these railroads by any means. We do not undertake to fix the price at which freight shall be moved upon any of the roads, but we undertake to say that certain evils which now exist shall cease to exist, and put upon them the force of statutory prohibition.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Oregon allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SLATER. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the Senator think that the rates charged in cases he has used as illustrations were unreasonable and extortionate?

Mr. SLATER. I do not like to venture upon that line. I am not a railroad man; I have not been engaged in the transportation of freight.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator has not made up his mind as to whether they are fair or extortionate rates, I wonder that he denounces them so. I have no doubt in my own mind that the rates which he has described were extortionate and unreasonable and that any court in the land would hold them so, and I wonder that he doubts it.

Mr. SLATER. I am not denouncing the rates; I am denouncing the discrimination and the method of discrimination.

Mr. HARRISON. In other words, it amounts to this, that if a rate from one point, say from Portland, to some point on his line is a reasonable rate considered in itself, he would prohibit the charging of that reasonable rate because an unreasonable rate was charged somewhere else. This bill prohibits all unreasonable rates; it makes certain charges extortions; and if the instances to which the Senator has referred are instances of unreasonable charges, as I have no doubt they are, inexcusable and extortionate, then the bill in its present shape meets exactly the evils of which he complains.

Mr. SLATER. But does not the Senator see that before we go into the courts to establish the fact that a particular discrimination is unjust or a particular rate unreasonable, we must establish some standard to which the party when he goes to court can refer as a fact or as evidence?

Mr. HARRISON. What further evidence would the Senator want than the evidence that they hauled it for a much longer distance for a less rate?

Mr. SLATER. That certainly is a very forcible proposition as put by the Senator from Indiana, and it is exactly at that thing that I desire to strike. I am willing to take the $200 a car-load as a reasonable rate and judge of the $400, supposed to be charged in the instance I gave, as an unreasonable demand; but I want to put it into the statute in such a way that it will be prohibited, and being prohibited it will not be exacted.

That is all I wish to say.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to occupy a moment on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon. In one respect, if not in many respects, this is a vital amendment. It is a departure in the first place from the theory, if I may use that word, of the Senate bill which we are considering. It has been said in the debate, and truthfully said, that the amount of capital invested in railway corporations in the United States reaches to thousands of millions of dollars, and the receipts of these corporations run far into the hundreds of millions. The mileage of our railroads amounts now to 125,000 miles. So then the interest involved as respects the capital invested in railways is a vast interest and would admonish us to legislate with care, having reference only to that interest if we only had that to look to; but when we come to estimate the vast interests that lie behind these railroads, and that are compelled to use them for their purposes, we ought to be admonished especially to legislate with care lest we do injury to that class of people; and it is that class of people, as I understand, that we are intending to legislate for chiefly in the bill now before the Senate.

We have proposed in this bill, and the Senate I believe with unanimity has already agreed, that if this commission shall be appointed it shall investigate and report at the next session of Congress on the very questions which are involved in this amendment; and yet the Senator from Oregon proposes to incorporate this feature in the bill in limine, without examination on the part of these men whose duty it will be under the law as already agreed to make this investigation. If I felt perfectly clear, as the Senator from Oregon seems to feel, that this is an amendment which will operate beneficially to the great commercial interests and agricultural interests of the country, I would not hesitate to vote with him in planting it in this bill. But, Mr. President, if I understand this amendment correctly, it may do great injury to the interests which he and I in common seek to protect.

What is the principle which he endeavors to incorporate in this bill? It is that there shall be no competition and no advantage resulting from competition, because he lays down an iron-clad rule that there shall not be paid more for a shorter than for a longer distance, thus eliminating entirely the idea of competition, because if at a competitive point a certain rate is charged, that controls the entire charge from that competitive point to the point of destination; does it not? Is that a just rule as applied to all this country? Let me illustrate for a moment by some instances that have come under my own observation. The Senator from Oregon illustrates by instances that have come under his observation with reference to the charges made by the Northern Pacific Railway. If the statements made by the Senator from Oregon be true, as I have no doubt they are, then prima facie there is a case of extortion. But let us see how his rule would operate in other respects.

I see the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] before me. I noticed the other day in some debate upon this question that the rate of transportation from New York to New Orleans by way of Atlanta, Ga., was 75 cents per one hundred pounds, while the rate from New York to Atlanta—a distance of how many miles this side of New Orleans? Four hundred or five hundred miles?

Mr. BROWN. Five hundred miles.

Mr. ALLISON. To Atlanta, five hundred miles this side of New Orleans, the rate was a dollar per hundred. Of course, under the rule laid down by the Senator from Oregon, if the rate from New Orleans to New York city was fixed at 75 cents per hundred the rate all the way between New Orleans and New York must be 75 cents per hundred. That would appear to be a reasonable rule. But that is not the question. The question is, in the first place, is the rate of $1 per hundred from New York to Atlanta a reasonable compensation for the service rendered? If it be so, then another element enters into the question: why is it that 75 cents a hundred is charged from New Orleans? It is because at the city of New Orleans the railroads come into competition with ocean navigation, and the railways in order to meet that competition are willing to transport cotton or other articles that require transportation from New Orleans to New York at merely the cost of transportation, or perhaps a shade above that cost. They can only get the business by a charge which merely allows a shade of profit; or otherwise the ocean transportation will take the business wholly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I ask the Senator from Iowa, does not the fact that the railroads charge $1.50 a hundred for a shorter distance and 75 cents a hundred for a longer distance imply unreasonableness in the rate somewhere?

Mr. ALLISON. That is precisely what I am endeavoring to elucidate, and the rate named by the Senator being an extreme rate probably would constitute a prima facie case. The cases between Atlanta and New Orleans as compared with each other were as 75 cents to a dollar. I say that does not constitute a prima facie case of extortion or unreasonable discrimination, because the presumption is, or at least the fact is, that at New Orleans the railways are compelled to come in active competition and severe competition with the ocean communication from New Orleans to New York.

Now, take the case of Chicago, if you please. Why is it that Chicago has a radiating system of railways to the Northwest and Southwest and to the East? It is because she has lake navigation and because there are railways connecting there which do not even pass through our own country. The result of that is, as every one of us knows, that at certain seasons of the year property is transported from Chicago at a rate sometimes less than cost and sometimes barely at a shade above cost. Now, are we required by law in the beginning—I am speaking now of the very beginning of this legislation—to unsettle all the relations that have grown up in our Western country, if you please, arising from the fact that there is lake navigation from Chicago to New York, including water navigation by the Erie Canal, and from the fact that there are eight or nine railways there competing for freight, and to compel these railways either to lose all local business on the various lines between Chicago and New York or to increase their charges from Chicago to New York?

I have an illustration in reference to this that came under my own immediate observation. I happened to be in an interior town in the State of Pennsylvania some years ago, when some gentlemen inquired of me with reference to the bill which was then as now known by the name of a distinguished member of the House of Representatives, as the Reagan bill, and I asked them what they wanted to cure by the bill. They said that from the town where we were the charges for cattle or live-stock—it being in a live-stock region—were $55 per car-load to New York from that point in Western Pennsylvania, and that the charges from Chicago to New York were only $50 per car-load. I said, "That looks unreasonable, because you are five or six hundred miles nearer New York than is Chicago," and yet I said, "what will be the effect of this proposed change in the system? One of two effects will occur: Either the rate between Chicago and New York will be increased or the rate between the point where we were and New York will be reduced. If the rate is increased from Chicago it affects the people of all the West; and unless the railways are receiving a larger compensation than they deserve, taking their whole traffic together, the chances are that the rates between Chicago and New York will be increased."

Now, my judgment is that upon a matter so material as this we had better not jump into action without examination and consideration and care; and especially do I believe this representing as I do a people who transport millions upon millions of property from the places of production to the places of consumption in the Eastern States. I do not care to have railroads add to the cost of transportation of one hundred pounds of wheat from Chicago 3, 4, or 5 cents, and to give me as an answer and to give the people of this country as an answer that they have been compelled to do so because we have laid down an iron-clad rule that makes the rate from Chicago to New York control the rates for all the local traffic between Chicago and New York. That may be just; but with my imperfect information as a Senator upon that question, and with my inexpertness in running railway trains over the many thousand miles of this country, I am not prepared yet to put upon the statute-book a provision which shall so radically and so severely cripple and confine the great through commerce of this country. I will not do it, especially when I am willing to put upon the statute-book here and now a provision that all these charges, whether they be over the mountain-tops or in the valleys without gradients, shall be reasonable, and that any charges which are not reasonable shall be properly punished; that they shall not only be reasonable, but that they shall be without unjust discrimination in favor of one locality or another locality or in favor of one section as against another section.

As was stated here the other day by some Senator in this debate, the relations of this country are so diverse, that what is a proper rule for one section of it may be an improper rule for another. Take the productions of the great Northwestern region in which I live, and they are cereal products largely if not chiefly; they are the products that are either used in the Eastern part of our country or transported abroad; take the Southwest and you have a production of cotton especially and almost exclusively; and when you come to the Eastern portion of the country the transportation is largely of manufactured articles. Now, it may be that you can establish a uniform rule which will apply equally to all these conditions and all these relations existing in these different parts of our country; but I for one—and I shall do that at some risk perhaps of criticism—propose to go slowly in respect to radical legislation upon this question. I want the proposition of the Committee on Railroads to be adopted, so that we shall have a commission of eminent men whose duty it shall be to investigate these questions and to give us their combined judgment and opinion, not the judgment of one man with respect to these great questions affecting not the railroads, but affecting the great interests of the people of this country, who are themselves compelled to rely upon the railroads largely for the transportation of their products and the articles they consume.

Therefore it is, Mr. President, that I deprecate the introduction of this amendment, which is a radical proposition with regard to the management of railroads, and in that differs from the proposition of the committee which we are now considering in the Senate, which is to examine, to in the first place lay down general rules whereby extortion shall be prohibited, whereby unjust discrimination shall be prohibited, and whereby reasonable rates only shall be charged, and then to have a commission that shall investigate these practical questions and report to us their action.

But, Mr. President, I wish to say one further thing in regard to this amendment of the Senator from Oregon. If the evils which it proposes to cure are existing evils universal in their character, this is a lame and impotent remedy. The Senator from Nebraska inquired awhile ago of the Senator from Illinois what he would think of a railroad corporation that charged $50 for a car-load from Chicago to New York and charged $75 for a car-load from Chicago to a little village twenty-five miles distant from Chicago. That would to me look like extortion. But what would the Senator from Nebraska think of a railway that would charge $50 from Chicago to New York, and $50 for a car-load from Chicago to a village twenty-five miles distant with no grade and upon an easy track? What would that be under the rule laid down by the Senator from Nebraska or by this bill, or by the common sense and judgment of all of us? That would be extortion too, would it not?

If a railway can charge $50 to carry a car-load a thousand miles from Chicago to New York, crossing the mountains it may be, and then charge $50 for the same freight, for a car-load from Chicago to a village twenty-five miles distant from Chicago, what would that be? Would it not be extortion? Yet under this amendment that can be done. That is exactly what this amendment says ought to be done practically, because it says a greater rate shall not be charged for a shorter than a longer distance. Therefore, notwithstanding a commission may come in and say that this is an unjust rate and too high a rate, yet the railway can turn to this amendment and say, "Here is the adoption of a principle by Congress that has practically settled this question, because they say a greater rate shall not be charged, thereby practically saying the same rate may be charged."

Those gentlemen who seek to regulate railway rates by act of Congress ought not to bring forward so lame and impotent a remedy. If they propose that we here shall fix rates that shall control all the railway corporations of this country, let them bring in their bill looking to that end, and then bring in a bill that will be just to the railroads, and especially just to the shippers, because I have shown you certainly one instance, and I might give you a hundred, wherein under the very provision of the Senator from Oregon a railroad could practice injustice.

Suppose the point named by the Senator from Oregon instead of an interior town in the State had been the city of Portland, and that $400 was the rate from Saint Paul to Portland. Under his amendment and his bill, if that was the rate the railroad company could charge $400 for a car-load twenty miles out of Saint Paul. Do you tell me that that is a remedy for a great evil? It is an impotent remedy, because it only touches the question here and there; and therefore it is that I for one desire to proceed carefully and slowly in this matter, relying upon the investigations that may be made by an intelligent and well-paid commission.

Why do I do that? I do it because that has been successful in many of the States of this Union; and, although there has been some complaint of the commissions here and there in the different States, yet in the main they have remedied great evils in the local transportation in the several States. I want to experiment at least for one session of Congress before I undertake to upturn and upheave the railway system of our country as it affects the men who produce things and transport things. I want to understand the question more before I cast my vote for an iron-clad proposition such as is proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, there seems to be a strange conflict between Senators who favor the same proposition. One Senator, the Senator from New Jersey, says the fact that a railroad discriminates is evidence of extortion, and by reason thereof it should become the subject of enactment.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the Senator will bear with me I will say that when he undertakes to quote me I wish he would quote me exactly as I state my proposition. I inquired of the Senator from Iowa if the simple fact of charging for a less distance, for instance, $1.50 per hundred and charging for a greater distance only 75 cents per hundred was not evidence of extortion in the rates somewhere.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I infer from that that it was the Senator's opinion that it was an unreasonable discrimination. My position was that the advocates of this proposition on one side intimate that the fact of this discrimination is evidence of extortion, and therefore wrong; and another Senator, the Senator from Iowa, says that if this thing is not allowed, this kind of discrimination which the Senator from New Jersey says is evidence of extortion in his judgment, you will bankrupt the railroads.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I did not.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Well, would make them insolvent.

Mr. ALLISON. No.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Cripple them. That I think the Senator said. "Cripple the railroads;" let us stand on that. If they are crippled, it is nearly as bad as bankruptcy or insolvency. One Senator says it is evidence of their extortion; the other Senator says if they are not allowed to do it they will be crippled.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I did not say that.

Mr. VAN WYCK. We will examine the RECORD in the morning. I will say, then, that for this purpose the Senator from Iowa did not say that; but I should like to have the liberty to state in a word that he was arguing, as I understood him, the injustice of not allowing railroads to make this discrimination. Am I correct about that?

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, no.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me just a moment for a question?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Because I think I can give him a subject for discussion that will last him an hour. ["Oh, no!" "Oh, no!"]

Mr. VAN WYCK. I shall have to object to the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. FRYE. So do I.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator need not take an hour to answer it. I should like to have the Senator's view of the suggestion I am about to make. There are several great lines of railroad leading from Chicago, which is a great distributing point, so to speak, of the grain and products of the West to New York, the great export city of the United States. In this bill which is proposed by the Senator from Illinois it is said that no less shall be charged for transportation from any station east of Chicago than the rate charged from the city of Chicago. A short time ago we found the elevators along the New York and New Jersey shores filled with grain. The export demand had not enabled the grain to be shipped abroad, so that the elevators were filled. The continuance of that state of things, would, of course, stop the transportation from Chicago to the elevators. The elevators were filled with grain. The railroad companies could bring no more because there was no receptacle for it. The owners of the grain would not transport it, because they could not get its cost abroad. They appealed to the railroad companies to know what share of the loss the railroads would sustain by reason of the shipments already made to the elevators.

The Western producers stepped in and said to the railroads, "What share will you suffer of this loss in order that we may move our grain to market, knowing that we have no market at home, that it is supplied, and in order that the grain may find a market at all it must be shipped at a loss to producers and transportation companies alike?" Under this bill, supposing it to be the law of the land, could a railroad company have reduced its charges between Chicago and New York without reducing the charges on every local shipment that might be made at any points between Chicago and New York? If the railway companies had not stepped in and given an unreasonably low rate, a rate below the cost of doing the labor in transportation, the grain would not have been shipped.

Now, will the Senator tell me what he wants to have done? Does he desire that that grain shall not find a market, that it shall remain in this country; that if the railway companies will agree to carry it for less than cost they must make a corresponding reduction on all other transportation to all other stations? Does the Senator insist that the railroad companies shall not have the privilege of doing that?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will not take so much time to answer the question as the Senator did in propounding it. The Senator thought a state of facts existed whereby the railroads, in order to be transacting some business—there being no market for grain—in order to make an inducement to use their motive power, proposed to transport grain from Chicago to New York at a cheaper rate. That is what I understood. The necessities of the case were such that it was impossible for them to carry on business unless they had a great deal of through freight.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Is it any object for them to get it at a loss?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am not arguing that.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Has a railroad corporation, has a transport line, any particular object in suffering a loss?

Mr. VAN WYCK. No; but the Senator's proposition was that they proposed to do business at greatly reduced rates, as I understood. Now, we start at Chicago with our elevators full, with no market anywhere, and the railroads in their liberality and generosity to the people under this state of facts, which facts exist over the whole country, perhaps, reduce the rate per car from Chicago to New York $50, if you please. My friend comes to me in the western part of Pennsylvania, or the eastern part of Ohio, in a city five hundred miles nearer New York than Chicago, and the same state of facts exists there precisely: their elevators are full, they have no market for their grain, business is depressed, and it is just as much a matter of public necessity to get the grain there to market. These are public carriers, and the spirit of justice in the railroad company should allow the same rates from this nearer point.

Then I ask my friend if he thinks it right, where another city is five hundred miles nearer New York under the same circumstances than Chicago is, for the railroad which charges $50 per car-load from Chicago to New York to charge $25 a car-load from this nearer point to New York? Does he believe that to be right?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I believe that if the rate charged from any given point, be it less or more, is a reasonable rate—one that the railroad company is entitled to by reason of the service rendered—it can make no difference whatever in the principle of the thing if it agrees to do the work for nothing from a different point. It is no injury particularly to the man who pays a reasonable compensation for reasonable service that it should agree to do service for a less sum for a longer distance. I do not see any unreasonableness in that.

But the Senator will bear with me a moment longer, because I do not wish to interfere with his speech. The simple claim has been made here, and it is found in the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, and any fair-minded and candid man would say at the start, "Yes, that seems to be right; there is no reason why such a principle should not be incorporated in the legislation of the country." I say to Senators that the particular bill to which it belongs, the bill that came to us from the House of Representatives, contains within itself the iron-bound condition making requirements upon the railroads. The provision can be properly found there; but it will be remembered that the bill of the Senator from Illinois goes upon an entirely different idea. That idea is that it is better to appoint a commission, who shall have full supervision over all the business of railways, may hear complaints, may listen to cases of extortion and discrimination; in short, it places the power of adjudication in the hands of the commission. The House bill proposes to do by legislation what the amendment proposes to do by indirection.

Now I submit to the Senator from Oregon that the amendment he proposes, while very proper (and I believe it is already found in the body of the bill which he has given notice of his intention to move as a substitute), does not belong upon the Senate bill at all, and that the vote of the Senate is to be taken distinctly on the two propositions, each one standing by itself, without injecting into the body of the Senate bill a proposition which has no place there at all. The idea of the Senate bill is to give the proposed commission the power to adjust and adjudge. This proposition proposes to restrict them in the exercise of that power. One part of their duty is fixed by the language contained in the amendment of the Senator from Oregon. The other part of their powers is the power given by the bill of the Senator from Illinois. Now, sir, without committing myself to either proposition, for I do not know which one I shall prefer, certainly the amendment of the Senator from Oregon has no place upon the Senate bill, because those Senators who wish to vote distinctly upon the proposition to create a commission and confer upon them the power to adjust these differences do not want to see the commission fettered by such an amendment as this.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I might argue with the Senator from New Jersey indefinitely.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa starts another objection to this proposition, and he desires to know whether if a company charges $50 a car-load from Chicago to New York it would be right for the same company to charge $50 for a car-load from Chicago to a place fifty miles distant? Certainly it would not be right, but I apprehend it is not in his mouth to undertake to antagonize this proposition because it does not do enough. That is the position of the Senator from Iowa, that this proposition does not do enough. This proposition leaves power in the hands of the railroads to charge as much to a shorter point. It is strange for him to propound an objection of that kind for the purpose of showing that this measure is not all it should be. It is, however, a movement in the right direction, and it remedies this wrong which is conceded and admitted to be a wrong and an extortion.

My friend from Iowa says we ought to deal with this matter gently, by slow means; and he undertook to show that unless we allowed the system of competition on the part of railroads, which was so dangerous at the extreme, it would cripple them to a certain extent. That is another strange proposition at this stage of the debate. I suppose my friend from Iowa is in favor of the Hennepin Canal; so is my friend from Illinois in favor of the Hennepin Canal; yet they are so solicitous about the welfare of railroad corporations that they are unwilling to place an act of justice in this bill.

My friend from New Jersey says a railroad company executing a public trust has a right to carry from Chicago to New York for nothing, as I understand him to say, and then the other part of the proposition must follow, that the expense of their road, the interest on their bonds, and their dividends must be made and taken from people living between Chicago and New York.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator will bear with me one moment. The Government of the United States, if I remember aright the laws, allows the manufacturer of spirits when he exports the spirits to a foreign consumer to do so without paying any tax on the spirits. Is there anything wrong in that principle, I should like to ask the Senator?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I do not suppose there is to a man who believes in spirits.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then, if a railway company, for goods transported out of the country in order to reach a market, chooses to allow a rebate, is there anything wrong in that?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Just the same as there is in a rebate on any other branch of business. The whole people are equally interested. Going back to the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey, that the railroads have a right to transport from Chicago to New York free, as I understood him to say, if they choose to do so, I follow it up by saying, if that be so, the business between New York and Chicago must bear the expense of transportation and interest on bonds and dividends on stock, must it not?

Mr. McPHERSON. I did not say they had the right, but had the power.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I understood the Senator to say that they had the right to do it. They have the power. Then he does not believe they have a right to do that thing. What is the force of the proposition the Senator made if he does not believe a railroad company has a right to do that? I want to say here that I deny that right. A railroad company, a creature of law, made by the people, has no right to become an engine of oppression and wrong. It has no right to carry grain and flour from Chicago to New York for nothing, and then require all the business that goes on the line of the road between Chicago and New York to pay not only its legitimate cost, but also the cost of the transportation of the grain from Chicago to New York. That is the very point where we take issue. I can not understand the willingness of some Senators to extend the power of railroad companies.

But to go back. My friend from Illinois is in favor of the Hennepin Canal; my friend from Iowa is in favor of the Hennepin Canal. They are opposed to placing a just principle in this bill because it will cripple railroads. They say it will hurt us in the West if you do not allow railroads to have different rates at competing points. And yet my friend from Iowa who is from the West is willing to contribute the money taken from the pockets of the people either by internal-revenue laws or tariffs and appropriate that in building a canal through the State of Illinois which will have the necessary effect to injure railroads so that they can not have the absolute control to fix their own rates and charge what they choose. These seem to me to be antagonistic propositions.

I only rose, however, for the purpose of calling attention to the position of the Senator from New Jersey as well as the attitude of the Senator from Iowa. There is nothing in conflict. I have desired these gentlemen to show the beneficence of this power on the part of the railroad companies. If my friend from Iowa would commune with his people at home on this subject he would learn more from them than he can learn from any commission created by any act of Congress.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment.

If I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon, as explained by him, it permits the charging of as much for a short haul as for a longer one by a transportation company. That is offered in a section which is intended to prohibit discriminations and to afford the same facilities to all shippers. It is in a bill defining by Congress what shall and what shall not be discrimination. What is to be the effect of that legislation if adopted? Assuming for a moment that there is an evil in charging more for a shorter than a longer haul from competing points, what is to be the effect of that legislation? It will result in infinitely more evils than it is seeking to correct. What will be the result? Two consequences will follow: through rates will be advanced, and local rates, without reference to distance, will be advanced with the through rates. It permits to be charged for transportation ten miles distance what is permitted on the through line for a thousand. There is no escape from it. You are incorporating a rule that works the most outrageous, the most ruinous, and the most destructive effects upon local freights. No other legitimate conclusion can be reached, because the amendment permits as much for the short haul as for the through without reference to distance. It gives the sanction of Congress that carrying companies may charge for ten miles what they charge on through trips for a thousand. The result would be destructive to all local interests, and would at the same time (even if it did not affect local interests) advance through rates to a ruinous degree.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7964) to provide for the expense and compensation of special messengers to be sent by the Secretary of State to the States, respectively, of Iowa and Oregon for the certificates of the electoral vote of 1884 for President and Vice-President of the United States, in pursuance of the provisions of section 141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SPECIAL ELECTORAL MESSENGERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 7964) to provide for the expense and compensation of special messengers to be sent by the Secretary of State to the States, respectively, of Iowa and Oregon for the certificates of the electoral vote of 1884 for President and Vice-President of the United States, in pursuance of the provisions of section 141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the same bill which was passed by the Senate this morning, except that there is a word "November" to be changed to the word "December." I move that amendment and ask that this bill be now put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that this bill be now considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out "November" and insert "December," in line 9; so as to read:

Electoral vote of December, 1884.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 736) for the relief of James Hooper;

A bill (H. R. 1808) to detach certain counties from the United States judicial district of California and create the United States judicial district of Southern California;

A bill (H. R. 6220) regulating appeals from the supreme court of the District of Columbia and the supreme courts of the several Territories;

A bill (H. R. 6404) to authorize the service of civil and criminal process issued by Territorial courts within military and Indian reservations and the Yellowstone National Park; and

A bill (H. R. 7013) to regulate the effect of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States in the several States.

The bill (H. R. 2263) for the relief of the State National Bank of Boston, Mass., was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR. I think that should go to the Committee on Claims. The Committee on Claims has had several questions growing out of the same matter, and although one bill of this kind went to the Committee on the Judiciary, I believe it was afterward sent to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JACKSON. The Committee on Claims have actually reported on that case. The bill ought to go to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was under the impression that it provided for a suit in the Court of Claims on a controverted question and that it should be thus referred. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill (H. R. 3196) for the relief of L. A. Morris was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 5849) limiting the time for the presentation and payment of claims against the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER].

Mr. SLATER. I do not wish to continue the debate, but I am not quite ready to let some arguments that have been made here pass entirely without reply.

The Senator from New Jersey at my right seems to think that this amendment has no place in this bill; that it is foreign to the line of policy adopted in the bill; that while it may properly belong to and form a part of the House bill, to which he understands this bill will be moved as a substitute, it should not be introduced into this bill. Now, I fail to see the force of the objection of the Senator when the very section which is proposed to be amended is precisely on the subject that the amendment relates to; that is, discrimination. The amendment proposes to make the doing of certain things unlawful as a matter of discrimination. In other words, it gives point and force and effect to the section. It gets something into the section that will be valuable to the country and to the people who are interested in transportation.

It is objected to by the Senator from Iowa and also by the Senator from Tennessee that there are possible objections to this amendment, that it is not a complete remedy for all the evils that may be imagined or conjured up in relation to transportation. It is true, sir, as suggested by the Senator from Iowa, that a railroad company transporting interstate traffic would have the right from one point to another given point to charge the same rate for the shorter haul, and for a very short part of the haul in some instances that it charged for the longer haul. The roads have that right now, and they are practicing that right. It is true this only goes to a certain extent; it does not propose to cover the entire ground; and I presume if we should formulate it so as to even cover that we should find that in some way or other the railroads would in some instance find a means of evading the statute; but that, it seems to me, is no reason why we shall not meet the obvious discriminations that are known to the country, and instances of which have been given here, have been known for years, and have been the subject of consideration.

I will not undertake to say that even if this provision should become a law there would not be instances of very great injustice perpetrated under the forms of law notwithstanding the prohibition. I anticipate that there will be; but this will certainly cure a very large part of the evils complained of. It is no objection that because some possible evils may be imagined that may come up under this statute if it shall pass, therefore we should not legislate upon the subject at all. That is the do-nothing principle. Simply because the subject is one of difficulty, is one where we may not readily and easily meet all the objections that may be presented to a particular form of legislation, it does not therefore follow that we shall do nothing. That will not satisfy the country.

I think I have said all I desire to say in relation to this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CAMDEN. Mr. President, I desire to make a practical suggestion in connection with this amendment.

I recognize the great difficulties and the great dangers of regulating and governing by statutary legislation the business interests, and especially the large transportation interests, of this country. I recognize the fact that these interests can be better regulated by competition and by the rules that govern other business transactions than they can be by arbitrary rules enacted by Congress. But, sir, it appears to me that there is more in this amendment of the Senator from Oregon to satisfy the demands of the people who make complaint of the discriminations of railroads than perhaps in all the bills that could be passed by this body.

The reason why competition does not remedy the evils complained of is because competition does not exist in very large sections of the country that will be affected by this amendment. For instance, there are only a few through lines of trunk road between the great West and the East. On these trunk lines there are large sections of country between the West and the seaboard dependent upon each of these roads as their sole mode of transportation to reach the seaboard markets. Take points like Chicago, Saint Louis, Cincinnati, and other large centers in the West: competition itself regulates the prices of the transportation of commodities from these great centers to the seaboard. That fact alone always insures to the great competing centers the lowest rates of transportation.

Now, take the several hundreds of miles in each of the States of Ohio, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and other States lying between these great western points and the seaboard, and they, as I say, are dependent, respectively, upon single trunk lines of transportation to reach a market. The competition induces the railroads in very many instances to haul freight from these great western points to the seaboard cheaper than the roads can actually afford to do the business, and in order to make up for those losses they levy a higher rate than is reasonable upon the intermediate sections of country that are dependent upon them and are at their mercy. This produces a condition of feeling in the people along the lines of these roads antagonistic to the railroads, and they are demanding from Congress legislation to control the inequalities and injustices that affect them so seriously.

Take, for instance, a point in West Virginia two or three hundred miles from Baltimore, or the same proportionate distance from any other market, and there is a flouring mill there or any other manufacturing interest or live-stock gathered, the shippers there will be charged double the rate from that point to any of the eastern seaboard cities that would be charged from Cincinnati, or perhaps from Chicago, or a distance twice as great as that from the point in West Virginia to the seaboard. There is not only a glaring inconsistency in the rate itself, but there is a positive injury to those living on this interior line by allowing the products of the West to get to market at one-half the price they can get their own products, thereby enabling the West to undersell them in the very same market by this discrimination in transportation.

I could multiply these instances, but I simply give this as an illustration of what I know does exist. It happens every day in large sections of country, covering three hundred or four hundred miles along trunk lines, that a manufacturer or a flouring mill or person engaged in the live-stock industry will see car-loads of freight passing right by his door and going to the same market he wants to reach at one-half the rate at which he can ship from that point to the market, enabling those who have the cheaper rate of freight to undersell those nearer to market, without in my judgment any good reason for it.

Mr. President, I declare that in my humble judgment I believe the railroads have themselves made a very great mistake. There is no good reason that can be given why a railroad may not be enabled to haul a car-load of freight three hundred miles over the same line as cheaply as it can six hundred miles, taking it over the same line of road three hundred miles both ways. It is a mistake, in my judgment, in the policy of the railroads, and it has gotten up an unnecessary prejudice against that character of investment; and I believe the passage of this amendment will do more to satisfy the feelings of the country, while doing no harm to the railroads, than any or all other legislation upon this subject that we can pass.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question. I understand the Senator from West Virginia to favor the amendment because he thinks the effect of it will be to compel railroads to reduce their rates at all points between Chicago and Cincinnati and New York, for instance.

Mr. CAMDEN. My idea is that it will compel the railroads, if they choose to take freight from a greater distance at a specific price, to reduce it to the same price for intermediate points.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the reason the Senator gives for that is that the system which now permits railways to charge certain rates from Chicago, Cincinnati, &c., is a system which discriminates in favor of the agriculturist or manufacturer who lives west of those points as against the agriculturist or manufacturer who lives between those points and the seaboard.

Mr. CAMDEN. That is true.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I ask the Senator if in his judgment the effect of this will not be to increase the rates at the two competing points for through freights?

Mr. CAMDEN. My answer to that is that if competition forces the railroads to haul products long distances at a less rate than they can afford to carry them they shall not make up the loss off their local shippers on shorter distances.

Mr. ALLISON. Because the effect of the system as it now exists is to give the distant shippers the advantage of the local shippers?

Mr. CAMDEN. Yes, sir.

DEATH OF SCHUYLER COLFAX.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, late yesterday afternoon a report was circulated upon the floor of the Senate that the honorable Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, late Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, had suddenly fallen dead at Mankato, in the State of Minnesota. My colleague and I conferred together about this distressing news, but hoping that there might be in the report some element of mistaken identity, and deeming it proper that we should have absolute knowledge of the fact before calling the matter to the attention of the Senate, we did not yesterday make any announcement of the fact.

I do not know what the precedents of this body may be, but it seems to me to be eminently proper that when one who has occupied so conspicuous a place in this country as Schuyler Colfax has, and one who has been associated with this body as its presiding officer, is thus suddenly called away, the Senate should take some notice of the sad event.

Mr. Colfax was for many years in public life, first in the Legislature of his own State, then in the national House of Representatives, and then as Vice-President of the United States. He was greatly endeared to the people of his own State, and was especially held in respect and confidence by the people of that district in his State which he so long and so ably represented in the House of Representatives. He held this affection and this confidence unabated to the hour of his death.

In view of this sudden calamity, and as expressive of the sympathy and sorrow of the Senate, I move the adoption of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to offer a resolution at this time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with great sorrow of the sudden death of Hon. Schuyler Colfax, late Vice-President of the United States, and that out of respect to his memory the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I can not allow even this formal announcement of the death of an old friend whom I have known for many years to be entered upon the Journals of the Senate without adding one word to his memory.

It so happened that Schuyler Colfax and I entered Congress together, served for several years in the House of Representatives, were members of the same national conventions, were born in the same year, were of the same politics, and were thus intimately associated together both in public and in private life. He is now dead, suddenly carried away in the apparent vigor of life. I knew him well, and can say of him that he was generous, social, and friendly with every one. Sagacious and able in the management and control of men, industrious always in everything he undertook, faithful to his people and to the cause which he espoused, a good husband and affectionate father, and true always to his country.

For twenty years he enjoyed the full measure of public honors, repeatedly elected by his constituents, and three times honored by being chosen as Speaker of the House of Representatives, and then elected by the people of the United States as Vice-President. He was known in the Senate chiefly as its presiding officer. All who remember him here will bear witness to his impartial courtesy.

I wish simply to add my word of kindness to what has been said by his distinguished Senator. My respect, confidence, and friendship go with him to his grave. Honor to his memory. Peace and happiness in the future life to come.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to unanimously; and (at 4 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 14, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

CORRECTION OF JOURNAL.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I do not know that I followed the reading of the Journal precisely, but I understood the Clerk to read that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] and myself moved to reconsider certain votes. That is a mistake, if such be the entry on the Journal, so far as I am concerned. I made no motion of any description on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The name of the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. COLLINS, should have appeared in place of the name of the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. ROGERS. The correction will be made.

Mr. TUCKER. There was something in the Journal about the bill for the relief of the Metropolitan police force that I think was incorrect.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again read the entry in the Journal.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill of the House (H. R. 5668) for the relief of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia; and the same was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. POLAND, the bill of the Senate (S. 1432) for the relief of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider, &c.

Mr. TUCKER. I think the motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole House was made by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND].

The SPEAKER. It is probable the motion was made by the gentleman from Vermont, but in each case the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER] was recognized in the first instance and afterward yielded. If there be no further correction, the Journal will be approved as read.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 7081) to amend section 17 of an act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862." This bill is in relation to the Niobrara Valley Railroad. I will state to the House it is a unanimous report of the Committee on Pacific Railroads. It grants no land and makes no concession of any kind save that of the right of way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] asks unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar the bill he has indicated for present consideration. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the confusion which prevailed on the floor it was utterly impossible to follow the reading of the bill.

Mr. CURTIN. This day having been assigned for the consideration of bills and resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I must call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the regular order.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like to appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me just a minute to explain this bill and the attitude it occupies. It is somewhat long and I have no doubt many members did not hear distinctly the reading and could not understand it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] yield?

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to what I believe to be a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANDALL. The subject certainly has connection with executing the Constitution of the United States. I ask that the letter which I send to the desk may be read.

Mr. VALENTINE. Is the bill called up by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] objected to?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. REAGAN. I should object to unanimous consent at any time for the passage of that bill, because of the danger of Congress giving its consent in advance when it does not know what it is consenting to, and because the Territories should not be allowed to grant charters to railroads. The legislation of the Territory of New Mexico and of the Territory of Arizona on the subject of railroad charters ought to be a standing warning to the American people against such legislation.

EXPENSES OF SPECIAL ELECTORAL MESSENGERS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has risen to what he states to be a privileged question. The letter which the gentleman has sent to the desk will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 12, 1885.

SIR: A message from the President, inclosing a communication from me, will be sent to Congress to-day, informing that body in substance that one of the certificates of the electoral vote of Oregon and one of the certificates of the electoral vote of Iowa, not having been received by the President pro tempore of the Senate, it becomes incumbent upon me to send a special messenger to each of these States, pursuant to section 141 of the Revised Statutes, and asking that an appropriation therefor, to be immediately available, be made without delay.

I have taken the personal responsibility of sending the messenger to Oregon, as the distance is so great that any delay might possibly prevent his return in time for the count of the electoral votes on the second Wednesday in February. I have the honor to draw your personal attention to the matter, requesting that the appropriation be made, if possible, to-day, or at least to-morrow.

I inclose for your convenience a draught bill, adding that the estimate of $1,500 is thought to be reasonable considering the distance of the two points, the season of the year, and the possibility of a snow blockade, which may require the Oregon messenger to incur unusual expense in order to return before the second Wednesday in February.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

FRED'K T. FRELINGHUYSEN.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House a message from the President of the United States on the same subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, respecting the compensation for special electoral messengers to be appointed under the provisions of existing law. I earnestly invite the attention of Congress to this communication, and recommend that an appropriation be made without delay, to be immediately available, for the purposes indicated.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 13, 1885.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask to have read the one hundred and forty-first section of the Revised Statutes. It will be seen that the Secretary of State is required by law to do just what he has done.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 141. Whenever a certificate of votes from any State has not been received at the seat of Government on the first Wednesday of January indicated by the preceding section, the Secretary of State shall send a special messenger to the district judge in whose custody one certificate of the votes from that State has been lodged, and such judge shall forthwith transmit that list to the seat of Government.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not had the opportunity of conferring with all the members of the Committee on Appropriations, but I have conferred with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON], who is chairman of the Committee on the Law respecting Election of President and Vice-President, and I submit in my individual representative capacity the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to provide for the expenses and compensation of special messengers to be sent by the Secretary of State to the States, respectively, of Iowa and Oregon, for the certificates of the electoral vote of 1884 for President and Vice-President of the United States, in pursuance of the provisions of section 141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to pay the compensation, expenses, or mileage, as the case may be, of two messengers, one to the State of Iowa and one to the State of Oregon, to receive from the United States district judge in each of said States the certificate of the electoral vote of November, 1884, for President and Vice-President of the United States, deposited with such judges under the provisions of section 140 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and called for by the Secretary of State under the provisions of section 141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The sum hereby appropriated shall be immediately available, and shall be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. RANDALL. Unless there be some one who desires to make some remarks touching this matter I demand the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MILLS. What I want to ask is whether there is any penalty provided in the law for the enforcement of that law. If the Government is bound to meet the failure of these parties by making a fifteen-hundred-dollar appropriation, it seems to me that if there is any penalty provided in the law it ought to be inflicted on the delinquents, and if there is no penalty I think we ought to amend the law.

Mr. RANDALL. My recollection as to that point is not very distinct. The officer concerned is rather a State than a Federal officer, but I have no doubt that the President and the Secretary of State will take notice of the question asked by the gentleman from Texas.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 7964) was introduced and read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be considered in the House without reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and this will be considered the second reading of the bill. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] demands the previous question upon ordering this bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MONUMENT AT YORKTOWN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of War, dated January 9, 1885, inclosing one dated January 5, 1885, from Lieut. Col. William P. Craighill, Corps of Engineers, who was charged with the building of the monument at Yorktown, reporting the completion of the monument, and recommending that the balance of the appropriation for building the same be used in paying the wages of a watchman and erecting a suitable keeper's dwelling on the site.

The matter is commended to the consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 13, 1885.

SIGNAL STATIONS AT NANTUCKET, MASS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, inclosing a report of the Chief Signal Officer on the establishment of signal stations on the island of Nantucket, Massachusetts, and declaring the appropriation for that purpose insufficient; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS FOR INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an abstract of sixteen claims for Indian depredations reported to the Department since December 10, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. GLASCOCK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. 3661) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Lucy Le G. Jeffers; when the Speaker signed the same.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal of papers in the following cases:

To Mr. STRUBLE, in the case of W. W. Norris; no adverse report having been made.

To Mr. LORE, in the case of John W. Thompson; no adverse report having been made thereon.

PROPOSED REVENUE COMMISSION.

Mr. MILLS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7965) to create a revenue commission; which was read a first and second time. referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

REDUCTION OF BONDED DEBT.

Mr. WELLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7966) to refund the bonded debt of the United States at 2½ per cent. interest, to reduce taxation upon circulating bank-note currency, and to secure such currency against unnecessary disturbances and fluctuations by applying the national revenues economically to payment of the national debt; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

RETURN OF A BILL TO SENATE.

In compliance with request of the Senate the bill (S. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Lucy Le G. Jeffers was by unanimous consent ordered to be returned to the Senate.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

Mr. CURTIN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. By the order of the House, this day is assigned to the consideration of such bills as may be presented by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, does that take precedence of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The whole day is assigned to that business.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that at the earliest opportunity I shall call up the bill for the forfeiture of the land grants to the Northern Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I call up House bill 745, and ask unanimous consent to lay it aside to take up for consideration in lieu thereof a bill (S. 1820) to provide for the ascertainment of the claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801.

The Clerk began to read the bill, but was interrupted by Mr. HOLMAN, who said: Must not this bill receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. That point has not been made, and therefore the Chair has not decided it. The Senate bill is on the Speaker's table. The gentleman from North Carolina, under the special order, has called up for consideration the House bill, but asks that the House bill may then be laid aside and the Senate bill taken up. The gentleman asks unanimous consent. He has a right, under the order of the House, to move to take this bill from the Speaker's table, and then if the point of order were made the Chair would be called upon to decide it.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, which is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That such citizens of the United States, or their legal representatives, as had valid claims to indemnity upon the French Government arising out of illegal captures, detentions, seizures, condemnations, and confiscations prior to the ratification of the convention between the United States and the French Republic concluded on the 30th day of September, 1800, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 31st day of July following, may apply by petition to the Court of Claims, within two years from the passage of this act, as hereinafter provided: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not extend to such claims as were embraced in the convention between the United States and the French Republic concluded on the 30th day of April, 1803; nor to such claims growing out of the acts of France as were allowed and paid, in whole or in part, under the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Spain concluded on the 22d day of February, 1819; nor to such claims as were allowed, in whole or in part, under the provisions of the treaty between the United States and France concluded on the 4th day of July, 1831.

SEC. 2. That the court is hereby authorized to make all needful rules and regulations, not contravening the laws of the land or the provisions of this act, for executing the provisions hereof.

SEC. 3. That the court shall examine and determine the validity and amount of all the claims included within the description above mentioned, together with their present ownership, and, if by assignee, the date of the assignment, with the consideration paid therefor: Provided, That in the course of their proceedings they shall receive all suitable testimony on oath or affirmation, and all other proper evidence, historic and documentary, concerning the same; and they shall decide upon the validity of said claims according to the rules of law, municipal and international, and the treaties of the United States applicable to the same, and shall report all such conclusions of fact and law as in their judgment may affect the liability of the United States therefor.

SEC. 4. That the court shall cause notice of all petitions presented under this act to be served on the Attorney-General of the United States, who shall be authorized, by himself or his assistant, to examine witnesses, to cause testimony to be taken, to have access to all testimony taken under this act, and to be heard by the court. He shall resist all claims presented under this act by all proper legal defenses.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to procure, as soon as possible after the passage of this act, through the American minister at Paris or otherwise, all such evidence and documents relating to the claims above mentioned as can be obtained from abroad; which, together with the like evidence and documents on file in the Department of State, or which may be filed in the Department, may be used before the court by the claimants interested therein or by the United States, but the same shall not be removed from the files of the court; and after the hearings are closed the records of the proceedings of the court and documents produced before them shall be deposited in the Department of State.

SEC. 6. That on the first Monday of December in each year the court shall report to Congress, for final action, the facts found by it, and its conclusions in all cases which it has disposed of and not previously reported. Such finding and report of the court shall be taken to be merely advisory as to the law and facts found, and shall not conclude either the claimant or Congress; and all claims not finally presented to said court within the period of two years limited by this act shall be forever barred; and nothing in this act shall be construed as committing the United States to the payment of any such claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, without having had an opportunity to examine this bill carefully I raise the question of order under Rule XXIII, clause 3, that the bill involves a charge upon the Government and must receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I base this point of order upon the general scope and purpose of the bill rather than on any special clause.

Mr. CHACE. I did not hear the point of the gentleman from Indiana. I would like to hear him state it again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order that under the rules of the House this bill must receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CHACE. Upon what ground?

The SPEAKER. Upon the ground that it authorizes the examination of these claims by the Court of Claims, and will require hereafter an appropriation to be made to comply with the provisions of the bill if passed.

Mr. CHACE. I wish the gentleman from Indiana would point out what part of the bill requires an appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the language of Rule XXIII enumerates, as matters which must receive their first consideration in Committee of the Whole:

All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations alredy made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property.

It seems to me this measure is subject to the point of order I seek to raise, on the ground that it is a preliminary procedure upon which must be based hereafter an appropriation of money out of the Treasury.

Mr. MORSE. I would like to have the gentleman from Indiana point out any word in this bill which calls for a dollar of appropriation.

The SPEAKER. Will it not create a liability on the part of the Government?

Mr. MORSE. Not at all. The bill simply provides that these claimants may go before the Court of Claims and the court may ascertain what, if anything, is due to them. The bill contemplates nothing more.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But that, Mr. Speaker, involves, of course, payment if anything should be found to be due.

Mr. MORSE. Not at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that the very first clause of the third paragraph of Rule XXIII seems to cover this case. I admit that the bill is very carefully drawn for the purpose of avoiding this question of order. But the language of the rule is:

All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people.

That this measure does "involve" or contemplate an expenditure of public money would seem to be an inevitable conclusion from the scope and character of the bill.

Mr. CHACE. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the last three lines of the last section of this bill:

And nothing in this act shall be construed as committing the United States to the payment of any such claim.

Mr. MOULTON. That appears to be conclusive.

Mr. CHACE. If that does not settle the point of order I can hardly imagine any form of language that would do it.

Mr. RICE. I desire to present to the Chair distinctly this question: Is there anything in the bill which without further legislation would justify an expenditure of a single dollar of money by the United States? I believe there is nothing of the kind. The bill simply contemplates the auditing of these claims.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. The bill expressly provides that the action of the court shall be limited to an ascertainment of the law and the facts, and that "such finding and report of the court shall be taken to be merely advisory as to the law and facts found." The bill makes no appropriation at all, and does not contemplate any unless Congress shall see proper hereafter to make one in pursuance of the finding of the court.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think it has been held heretofore that any bill looking toward an appropriation of money, anything tending to lessen the value of property of the United States, lands, money, or anything else, is obnoxious to the point of order, under the third clause of Rule XXIII.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to call the attention of the Chair——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. COX, of New York. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. DINGLEY. Under the ruling in the Forty-fourth Congress, where a bill may involve the expenditure of money but does not directly require an appropriation it does not necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to remark in regard to the last clause of the bill, the language of which is "and nothing in this act shall be construed as committing the United States to the payment of any such claim," that it is inoperative and means nothing so far as this question is concerned if the general scope of the bill involves or contemplates a public expenditure.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, upon examination of this bill, does not see that it makes any appropriation or requires any appropriation to be made by Congress, but it simply provides for an investigation of these claims by the court, leaving it, as the Chair understands the provisions of the bill, to Congress hereafter to say whether or not appropriation shall be made even where a claim is held to be just by the court. The Chair thinks the point of order is not, therefore, well taken.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, in advocating the passage of the pending bill, I do not propose to consume the time of the House by giving more than a brief historical outline of the origin of these claims, the action of our Government in regard to them, and the nature of the provisions of the bill it is proposed to adopt. If I should fail to be understood by any member I would be pleased if at the close of my remarks he would propound any questions which might tend to shed additional light on the subject.

It is a matter of familiar learning that in our Revolutionary struggle the United Colonies were sorely pressed for all the necessaries of successful war. Amid the hardships and discouragements at Valley Forge even Washington all but despaired, and emphatically declared that unless something was speedily done our little army must "starve, dissolve, or disperse." In this emergency France came to the rescue, and entered into a treaty of amity and "perpetual friendship." She supplied us with men and money, and gave us that moral and active support which infused new life into our waning cause. With this change Cornwallis began his retreat across the continent, soon was cooped up at Yorktown, where he was compelled to surrender his forces to the allies; then the blessings of a coveted peace followed, and the independence of our young Republic was assured.

It is also known that in the latter part of the last century nearly all the nations of Europe were engaged in war. France and England were at war. France claimed, or her friends claimed for her, that she was involved in war with Great Britain in consequence of the part she had taken in aiding us to achieve our independence. I will spend no time in pursuing that inquiry; it is not material to the present investigation. It is sufficient to know that our merchants, availing themselves of their neutral position, engaged largely in providing the belligerents of the Old World with supplies, chiefly of provisions.

Soon the war upon the continent assumed such violence and magnitude that all rules of civilized warfare and international law were set at defiance.

Our commerce became the prey to rapine and plunder; ships were seized, their contents appropriated, and our sailors detained. France was especially regardless of our rights, and the consequence was that our commerce was almost swept from the seas.

In this emergency Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, addressed a circular letter to the merchants of the United States, in which he gave them this promise:

I have it in charge from the President of the United States to assure the merchants engaged in foreign commerce that due attention will be paid for any injuries they may suffer on the high seas or in foreign countries contrary to the law of nations or existing treaties, and that on their forwarding well-authenticated evidence of the same proper proceedings will be adopted for their relief. (Doc. 102, page 216.)

This, emanating from such a distinguished source, gave new impulse to our commercial enterprises and many captures and great losses ensued. As was to be expected, our Government did not fail to attempt to fulfill her obligations to her citizens, but at the earliest practicable moment made her demands on all who were engaged in these spoliations. England paid over $10,000,000 for her depredations, while Spain and other nations paid lesser sums.

When France was called on for indemnity she did not deny her liability, but sought to extenuate her conduct by declaring that, inasmuch as we and the people of Great Britain spoke the same language and had much the same appearance, captures often occurred by mistake; that with the combined forces against her she was sorely pressed, and that necessity compelled her to get supplies when and where she could. While she claimed that our Government had violated its treaty stipulations with her and thereby incurred responsibilities which must be taken into consideration in adjusting these claims. These treaty stipulations are so admirably summarized by Mr. Sumner, I can not do better than quote from his report to the Senate in 1870 the following:

The treaty of amity and commerce contained a succession of mutual stipulations, by which the United States undertook, first, to protect and defend by their ships of war, or convoy any or all vessels belonging to French subjects, so long as they hold the same course, "against all attacks, force, and violence, in the same manner as they ought to protect and defend" the vessels of citizens of the United States. (Articles 6 and 7.) Secondly, to open their ports to French ships of war and privateers with their prizes and to close them against those of any power at war with France, except when driven by stress of weather; and then "all proper means shall be vigorously used that they go out and retire as soon as possible." (Article 17.) Thirdly, to allow French privateers "to fit their ships, to sell what they had taken, or in any other manner whatsoever to exchange their ships, merchandise, or any other lading;" but privateers in enmity with France are forbidden even to victual in ports of the United States. (Statutes at Large, vol. 8, p. 13.) As if to round and complete these engagements it was further stipulated on the part of the United States, in a consular convention which, after many perplexities of diplomacy, baffling the tried skill of Franklin, was finally signed by Mr. Jefferson, in 1788, as a postscript to the earlier treaties, that French consuls and vice-consuls in the United States should have power and jurisdiction on board French vessels in civil matters, with the entire inspection over such vessels, their crews, and the changes and substitutions there to be made. (Article 7, Ibid., p. 112.)

In addition, France had been guaranteed her possessions in America, which might at any time expose us to the hazards of war. Such was the price we paid for that alliance, which was a potential factor in our contest for freedom.

During the progress of the complications of the European powers a secret treaty was entered into between the United States and Great Britain which greatly exasperated France, especially when Washington issued his proclamation of neutrality and impartiality between the belligerent powers; and when this treaty was finally divulged there was an outburst against us, and our policy was openly branded as a violation of our engagement with France and was declared to be a "condescension of the American Government to the wishes of its ancient tyrant." The Directory refused to receive our ministers, and by a succession of edicts declared that it would treat our neutral vessels either as to confiscations or searches in the same manner in which they suffered the English to treat them.

In pursuance of this spirit, unjust and lawless spoliations continued to be committed against our vessels until it became necessary to authorize vessels of the United States to arm and retaliate. In this hour of perplexity our Government appointed a special mission, composed of three of her most eminent citizens, to visit France and see if they could not by treaty secure an adjustment. Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, in his letter of instructions to them, employs the following language:

In respect to the depredations on our commerce the principal object will be to decide upon an equitable mode of examining the claims of our citizens and the manner and mode of making compensation. The proposed mode of adjusting the claims by commissioners appointed on each side is so perfectly fair we can not imagine that it will be refused.

Yet the plenipotentiaries were enjoined not to renounce the claims of our citizens nor to stipulate that they be assumed by the United States Government.

Our commissioners found the Republic in no condition to treat, for Napoleon was then victorious and Talleyrand was at the height of his power. They were therefore compelled to return without accomplishing the object they had in view. Subsequent causes of exasperation arose, when Congress suspended all commercial intercourse between the two countries until France should refrain from aggressions and depredations against the vessels and property of the citizens of the United States. Our Government even went further than asserting the rights of the claimants, by putting herself in an attitude of defense. The Directory of France thereupon invited negotiations, and Mr. Adams, for the sake of peace, appointed a new commission, to whom he gave explicit directions in regard to demanding indemnity. Upon our plenipotentiaries reaching Paris the Directory had ceased to exist. They were cordially received by Talleyrand, who presented them to the First Consul. Negotiations were at once commenced, which resulted in the treaty about which there has been an unending controversy.

France demanded that she should be allowed to

for our violation of the treaty stipulations against those of citizens of the United States for spoliations of our commerce, but proposed to surrender the advantages secured to her on condition that our Government would yield its claims, as may be seen from the concluding paragraph of the basis suggested by her plenipotentiaries, which is as follows:

The indemnities which shall be due by France to the citizens of the United States shall be paid by the United States. And, in return for which, France yields the exclusive privilege resulting from the seventeenth and twenty-second articles of the treaty of commerce, and from the rights of guarantee of the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance.

BONAPARTE.
C. P. CLARET FLEURIEU.
ROEDERER.

The American plenipotentiaries on the contrary declared this proposition inadmissible. The claims of France were national while ours were individual, and the commissioners were not empowered to make any such negotiation. It therefore appeared as if no good could eventuate from this conference and a deadlock was inevitable. There were other provisions about which the commissioners could treat, and after meeting day after day, on the 30th of September, 1800, they agreed upon what is known as a provisional treaty, the most important stipulation of which is as follows:

ARTICLE II. The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree at present respecting the treaty of alliance of February 6, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of 14th of November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time, and until they may have agreed upon these points the said treaties and convention shall have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows.

Thus was this harassing and annoying subject, after eight years' controversy, and so gratifying was it to all parties in France, that it was made the cause of general rejoicing and feasting, and at a grand banquet held in its honor, the First Consul was present and participating.

BROUGHT TO A CLOSE;

The result in the United States was not regarded with favor, and when the matter was brought before the American Senate, the second section was stricken out. On the 8th of February, 1801, President Adams, through the Secretary of State, proclaimed the convention duly ratified, save and except the second article, which was declared to be of no validity.

The question here arises whether our claims were abandoned? From the correspondence of the American minister and the plenipotentiaries of France it may be readily seen that this was a matter which each side feared and sought to evade. On the 31st of July, 1801, the convention was ratified by the First Consul with the second article eliminated, to which, however, he appended the following proviso: "That by this retrenchment the two states renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article." The convention with this modification was submitted to the Senate by President Jefferson and again ratified. On the 21st of December, 1801, it was promulgated by the President in the usual form with the supplementary proviso, and all persons were enjoined to respect and obey every provision of the same.

From this time forward the Government of the United States the claims of her citizens against France. Was this a final settlement of the question? It appears to have been so regarded by each of the contracting parties, for we hear no more of claims and counter-claims.

CEASED TO PRESS

Now the question arises, did our Government consider that she had offset the claims of her private citizens against the claims of France, or did she consider that she had done all that she peaceably could to enforce their just claims, and had thereby discharged her obligations to them?

No one will hesitate in determining that this treaty was of great public advantage, for it was a treaty of peace with a cherished ally. But was it not purchased through the claims held by our private citizens against the Government of France? The testimony of contemporary statesmen and concurring events all lead to this conclusion. Mr. Pickering, who was Secretary of State under Washington and Adams, and who wrote the instructions of our plenipotentiaries, in speaking of this treaty employs the following language:

Thus the Government bartered the just claim of our merchants on France to obtain a relinquishment of the French claim for a restoration of the old treaties, especially the burdensome treaty of alliance, by which we were bound to guarantee the French territories in America. On this view of the case it would seem that the merchants have an equitable claim for indemnity from the United States. * * * It follows, then, that if the relinquishment had not been made the present French Government would be responsible; consequently the relinquishment by our own Government having been made in consideration that the French Government relinquished its demands for a renewal of the old treaties, then it seems clear that, as our Government applied the merchants' property to buy off those old treaties, the sums so applied should be reimbursed.

Chief-Justice Marshall, in conversation with Mr. Preston, of South Carolina, said that "having been connected with the events of the period and conversant with the circumstances under which the claims arose, he was, from his own knowledge, satisfied that there was the strongest obligation on the Government to compensate the sufferers by the French spoliations."

Madison, while Secretary of State, in his instructions to Mr. Pinckney, then minister to the court of Spain, bears testimony to the justness of these claims in the following words:

The claims from which France was released were admitted by France, and the release was for a valuable consideration in a correspondent release of the United States for certain claims on them.

This was written in 1804, some time after the adjustment.

I might cite other testimony of a similar character, both French and American. But it is not necessary for the approval of the measure now before the House to pass upon the validity of these claims, for it is insisted that if the petitioners have but the color of claim, or right, it is incumbent on our Government to and this bill provides for no more.

GIVE THEM AT LEAST A HEARING,

We now come to the action of our Government in relation to this matter subsequent to the treaty of 1801. There have been, Mr. Speaker, altogether forty-six reports from committees of the two Houses of Congress on this subject. Three of these were made prior to 1824, and were adverse to the claimants. They were, however, made before the testimony then in the archives of the Government was accessible to members of Congress. They are necessarily incomplete and unsatisfactory. In 1824, by a resolution of the Senate, the Secretary of State laid before that body all the testimony in his Department in regard to the matter, which is embraced in these two large volumes I hold in my hand, which from their size must make it apparent to the mind of every member present that it is absolutely impossible for members to examine them with that care and deliberation, which the subject demands in order to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion as to the merits of the claimants.

After these reports were presented in 1826—for it took the Secretary of State two years to compile and arrange them—until the present time there never has been an adverse report to either House of the American Congress against the justness and validity of these claims; and it is a remarkable fact that to-day we have reports from two committees of this House, made to this Congress, unanimously recommending the passage of this bill, to wit, the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Foreign Affairs. At the time these committees acted I do not suppose either was aware of the action of the other. Since 1836 there have been forty-three reports in favor of the petitioners, and the committees presenting them have numbered among their members some of the most eminent and distinguished statesmen of the nation. Among them I need only mention Messrs. Webster, Everett, Choate, Crittenden, Sumner, and others, who, after careful consideration and examination of the testimony, have all reported in their favor. Each of the thirteen original States of this Union have petitioned time and again in behalf of their settlement.

It is true, sir, that during this time only two bills have passed the House. One originated in the Senate, which was vetoed by Mr. Polk, chiefly on the ground that we were at war with Mexico, the condition of the Treasury was not such as to authorize an appropriation, and that the bill, passed so near to the close of the session, it could not receive that consideration to which it was entitled. Notwithstanding the veto, the Senate voted 27 ayes to 15 nays—not two-thirds—to pass it over the veto, which, though a large majority, was not sufficient to prevent its failure. Gentlemen will perceive that the present bill simply proposes to transfer the consideration of these claims where there will be ample time to judicially determine all questions of law and fact, which are to be reported to Congress for final action. Hence it is not obnoxious to the objections contained in this veto message.

In 1855 a second bill passed the House, which was vetoed by Mr. Pierce. In his message he entered elaborately into the discussion of the question. He argued that to recognize the validity of the claims at that day would be a reflection on the good faith of the Government, inasmuch as it had failed to adjust them theretofore. Why, Mr. Speaker, it was not the fault of the claimants that they had been so long postponed, for they had ever been vigilant, active, and urgent in their demands. So early as in 1803 they secured a report of the facts, which were in their favor. In 1807, in a report submitted to Congress, occurs this language:

> That this Government by expunging the second article of our convention with France of the 20th of September, 1800, became bound to indemnify the memorialists for these just claims which they otherwise would have rightfully had on the Government of France.

Furthermore, it is no apology for the Government to seek to avoid its responsibility by declaring that the claims are stale, when they may have become so by its own action. And not only this, Mr. Speaker, it would be a greater reflection upon the distinguished men who, after careful examination, have made reports in their favor to the respective Houses to declare that they had been inconsiderate and negligent in arriving at their conclusions. I repeat, it would be an unjustifiable reflection upon these men to say they had not bestowed sufficient care and thought upon the reports which they submitted, leaving out the fact that there were 113 yeas to 81 nays in the House, in which it originated, in favor of passing the bill over the veto of the President. There are some five or six objections urged against these claims to which I will now invite your attention.

The first is, that the claim is stale. That I have answered. The second is that the state of the Treasury was not in a condition to warrant an appropriation. That is not the case to-day, and was never a valid objection provided the claims are just. The third, that there was a state of war between France and the United States during the time these depredations were committed upon our commerce. That is a question of fact which can be more thoroughly investigated in a court of law than by this body, pressed as it is for want of time. Hence it should be referred to the Court of Claims. Fourth, it is said these claims were embraced in the Louisiana convention. That is a question of law and fact which the Court of Claims is peculiarly suited to determine. Fifth, that they were embraced in the convention of 1831. That is a question of law and fact, and should have a similar reference. Sixth, Congress annulled the French treaty, and thereby vacated these claims. A mixed question of law and fact eminently appropriate for this court. There are, therefore, shown to be several objections which, should the court determine either one in favor of the Government, would put an end to the claims. Be that as it may, as a citizen can not sue his government, it is but just and equitable that she should at least give him a hearing.

When we consider, Mr. Speaker, how these claims arose, that they originated in the days of our weakness and amidst our early struggles for independence; when we consider that the original claimants were the hardy pioneers of our commerce, and stood by our ancestors in their struggle for those liberties we to-day enjoy, and that their claims were the probable means of amicable adjustment of difficulties that might not only have continued our Government in entangling alliances abroad, but eventually involved us in war with the very government that had contributed so much to our independence—I repeat, when we consider these things, and that all the Revolutionary soldiers and their descendants have been provided for, and that we have recently completed and are to dedicate with impressing ceremonies one of the highest monuments in the world to the memory of the Father of his Country, justice, equity, and good faith alike demand that we should at least grant these claimants an impartial hearing. That is all that is proposed by this bill. After the court shall have determined the law and the facts, and ascertained whether the original claimants had good cause of action, and whether the present claimants are their descendants or assignees for a valuable consideration, then, and not until then, will Congress be called upon to determine what is its duty in the premises.

We ask for no appropriation, as the Speaker has ruled. But all we ask is that this tribunal may act as a commission to advise the conscience of Congress, in the same way that a chancellor may call upon his clerk and master, or a jury to aid him in ascertaining the merits of a cause, or, in other words, to advise his conscience. I have called attention to the documentary evidence in this case and the impossibility of a body of legislative character, changing, as it does, every two years in this House, giving that careful consideration in regard to the law and the facts which this case so imperatively demands. And I call attention to another fact. Of the forty-six reports heretofore made forty-three of them contemplated an appropriation by this Government to pay these claims. I repeat it, they contemplated an appropriation, whereas the present bill contemplates nothing of the kind. Furthermore the bill protects the interests of the Government of the United States in this respect: It provides that every claim that shall be presented, or a list of all the claims that shall be presented, shall be handed to the Attorney-General of the United States, and that either he or his assistant may appear before that court, examine the testimony, examine the witnesses, make arguments, and interpose legal barriers. Also that after they shall from time to time report to Congress the law and the facts as ascertained by them. And it not only does this but goes further and excludes a conclusion. It says that the Government shall not be bound by the finding of this court; and, therefore, before any act can be placed upon our statute-books, calling for an appropriation, Congress must provide at a future session for whatever amount, if any, it sees proper to apply for the benefit of the claimants.

The question has been asked what amount the Government will have to pay, if it ever pays anything to these claimants. There are various estimates. I have a statement from the honorable Secretary of State, Mr. Frelinghuysen, predicated on the estimate of Mr. Sumner, which is published in connection with this bill, which estimates the probable amount to be between twelve and thirteen million dollars. But he says he has no accurate data by which he can ascertain the amount. It has been estimated that it will range from five to seven million dollars. We know that all of the original claimants have long since passed away, and many claims with them. Another generation has risen up and most of them have crossed the river. All that the present claimants ask of this Congress, and they have a right to make that demand, is that they may go before a tribunal established by the American Government and have their rights inquired into, for it is well known that no citizens can sue our Government. They must, therefore, appeal to the honor and magnanimity of their great Government to allow them to go before a tribunal of its own creation, peculiarly appropriate to the ascertainment of claims of this character, that it may pass upon them and say whether they have any claim to indemnity.

If it be true that they were embraced in the treaty of 1803 that is the end of the litigation. If they were embraced in the convention of Louisiana that is the end of it. But the law and the facts should be ascertained before some such tribunal as this. If they are not concluded by the conventions and treaties I have adverted to then this court is to ascertain and, if so, then whether the claimants now before Congress are entitled to the relief they ask for.

I know it may be said, and it sometimes is said, that these claims have fallen into the hands of speculators, insurance companies, or others. Suppose they have? Why, in the Alabama Claims Commission insurers were allowed out of the fund the amount of the losses they had sustained. Why? Because, according to all well recognized principles of law, they were entitled to be subrogated to all the rights of the insured. But that is not material.

Mr. MILLIKEN (in his seat). It is not true, either.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. That is not material, because this bill goes on and provides that this court shall ascertain who are the bona fide owners of these claims; whether any have been assigned, and, if they are in the hands of assignees, the court will so report. And they will not only do that, but they will ascertain further the amount which the assignees paid for the claims. The bill is guarded in every respect, and no injury, but much good, will result to this Government in preserving its good faith toward its citizens by complying with the reasonable request of those who can only, I repeat, appeal to its magnanimity and sense of justice for a redress of their alleged grievances. We are not required to pass upon the justice of the claims. We need only to inquire whether they have a color of right, and surely forty-three reports by able and distinguished committes are enough to establish that; and if these claimants have a color of right, it is insisted that this Government is bound at least to give them a hearing, especially when they are asking for no appropriation. It may be insisted, as I judge it will, that this would be the first step toward an appropriation. Ah! if that should be so it is right that this Government should meet the question and not seek to avoid her responsibility because she fears that a proper examination of these claims will disclose the fact that she is justly and honestly indebted to these claimants! I say, therefore, that if gentlemen will carefully examine the provisions of this bill they will see that there is nothing in it to cause any member of the House to hesitate to comply with the reasonable request made by these claimants.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. With great pleasure.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If I understand the gentleman correctly, the bill does not seek an appropriation to carry out any opinion that may be delivered by the court?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then why is it that such an opinion as is desired could not be obtained by the committee under what is known as the Bowman act?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I am not familiar with the Bowman act.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The Bowman act provides that any Department or any committee of Congress may call for an opinion upon the facts and the law in any case pending in the Department or before the committee.

Mr. LONG. Not in all cases.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Not in all cases, it is true; but in all cases provided for in the Bowman act.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, that this act provides for a judicial examination in the presence of the Attorney-General, who shall protect the United States Government. The questions will be argued, the testimony will be inquired into, and all the facts will be laid before this House; whereas such would not be the case if an opinion were simply asked for by a committee, unless the committee should see proper to print all the facts, which would not be convenient. In fact, the objects of this bill could not be accomplished under the Bowman act, because this bill provides for the presentation of claims.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I made the suggestion in regard to the Bowman act because that is the simpler method wherever it can be resorted to.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, these claims have had a wonderful career. The original claimants, their children, and their grandchildren have long since gone the way of all the earth. But the hoary claims themselves are immortal. They appear before us this January morning in the year 1885 as fresh and vigorous as when in the last century they commenced their journey to the nation's Treasury.

I know of only two possible grounds on which the liability of the United States to these claimants can be based. It has been suggested, not by the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. COX, of North Carolina], but elsewhere, that between the years 1793 and 1800 our Government failed to do its whole duty to the merchants and others who met with losses on the high seas; that there was some negligence in failing to press with zeal these claims upon the French Government. There is a suggestion, though it hardly takes the form of argument, that because the French Government allowed its cruisers to prey upon our commerce, and because our merchants were unable to obtain redress, there arose in some way a claim for redress against the home government.

But I am satisfied that it will not be contended by the lawyers upon this floor or anywhere that there is any validity in such a claim. A good government is always eager to protect the rights of its citizens from foreign aggression. But there is no rule of law which compels a government to reimburse its citizens for the losses they may incur in the hazards of commerce. Moreover, it can be confidently asserted that no government ever struggled more assiduously to obtain redress for the wrongs of its citizens than did our struggling Republic in those eventful years between 1793 and 1800. If time permitted I could review the long series of acts which brought our Government to the very verge of war in its attempts to enforce these claims.

But I pass at once to what I conceive to be the only plausible ground on which these claims can be based. It is alleged that when the final treaty of 1800 was made between France and the United States our Government traded off these private claims of its own citizens, growing out of the losses I have mentioned, for a claim which France held against us, and that thereby in law and in justice our Government assumed the payment of these claims. On that basis rest all these claims. On that assumption is founded this whole argument. I admit, sir, that the argument is ingenious. I regard the argument made by Mr. Sumner in that famous report of 1870 as one of the ablest productions of that remarkable man. But, with all deference to the distinguished gentlemen who assert the validity of these claims, it seems to me that their argument rests upon this false assumption that France had a valid claim against our Government.

It has been argued with much earnestness and force by Thomas H. Benton, by Silas Wright, and by other eminent statesmen that when the treaty of 1800 was made it was the settlement of actual war between France and the United States. If that view be correct, under the laws of nations these claims were no longer valid against any government. But without stopping to press this argument, I may admit for the purposes of the discussion that our citizens did hold valid claims against France, growing out of the depredations upon our commerce.

The more serious question is, did France have any valid claim against our Government? If there was such a claim existing and valid under the laws of nations there is some solid foundation upon which the ingenious arguments of gentlemen can rest.

Now, sir, out of what did this pretended claim of France arise? There is but one answer. Out of the old treaty of alliance between France and the Colonies, made in 1778, and the alleged violation of that treaty by the United States. When the French monarchy passed away and the new republic arose from its ruins the visionaries of France were disposed to draw our young Republic into the great struggle which was convulsing all Europe.

It seemed to be the opinion of the impetuous French Minister Genet that the treaty of 1778 bound our Government to enter upon any war in which France might be engaged, offensive or defensive. He claimed that French privateers had not only the right to enter our ports, but to enlist American seamen for foreign war and to build on our soil ships for foreign aggression. In fact, that they had the right to make America the theatre of this great war between England and France. But the gentlemen who composed the administration of the Government of the United States in 1793 and between that time and 1800 never for one moment yielded to any such absurd pretensions. At the head of that Government was the Father of his Country. The Cabinet was composed of such men as Jefferson, Hamilton, and Edmund Randolph—men who knew something of international law, who knew something of that treaty and the force of its obligations. The history of that time shows that these great men carefully considered the provisions of that memorable treaty. They concluded that it imposed no obligation upon our Government to enter upon that offensive warfare which France was entering upon and which not long afterward indulged the ambition of Napoleon.

I must not trespass upon the time of the House to read even extracts from that treaty. For one, I am willing to accept the construction placed upon it by the sages and the fathers of the Republic. No one will contend that Jefferson can be accused of any leaning toward England or any prejudice against France. It is enough to say, without entering into elaborate argument upon this treaty, that the great statesmen of that day never failed to insist that our Government was under no obligation to engage in this great European war.

Do gentlemen understand the full meaning of this claim, that our Government, under the administration of Washington, violated its treaty? It means that we must reject the views of the men who formed that treaty and who bore so conspicuous a part in those memorable events. Not only that. The suggestion imputes a breach of faith, a violation of solemn obligations made with France on the part of those very men who, of all others, were likely to be animated by sentiments of gratitude toward their old ally.

At this distance from those events gentlemen flippantly assert that our Government violated this solemn treaty. I appeal from these claimants and their advocates to the opinions of Washington, of Jefferson, and of Hamilton. They always insisted that our Government had kept its faith and that France had been the first and constant violator of this treaty. And they were right. It was one of the vital and most valuable provisions of that treaty that free ships should make free goods. In 1793, at the very outset of these difficulties between France and the United States, the French Government issued a proclamation renouncing this principle. From the day that France gave this stab to the treaty of 1778 it had no worth or vitality to the United States; but from that day on until 1798 France was violating every month, I think it safe to say every day, the provisions of the treaty.

What was our Government doing between 1793 and 1800? American ships were being driven from the seas, preyed on to-day by the French cruisers, to-morrow by the English cruisers, both France and England violating not only their treaties but every rule of international law. Did our Government fail in any way in its duty toward these claimants? Not at all. From the very beginning our Government was carrying on negotiations for the redress of these wrongs. She sent commissioners and envoys repeatedly to France to secure for these claimants their rights. She exhausted every art of diplomacy. Not only that, our Government was not only negotiating in a peaceable way, but went to the very verge of war. Preparations were made for war. Expenditures for troops and the building of vessels were authorized. American vessels were authorized to retaliate and to bring into port for condemnation vessels bearing the flag of France. Finally Washington, after he had ceased to be President, was called from private life to take command of the American Army. He gave as one of the reasons for responding to the call that the aggressions of France had become unbearable, and he referred to her repeated violations of the treaty.

How can it be claimed that France could make this treaty which she had persistently violated and spurned for years a basis of a claim for damages? Will gentleman contend on this floor that France was not the contracting party which first broke the compact? Could France violate and ignore the treaty for seven long years and then invoke its aid and seek indemnity?

When did France discover that she had a claim against the United States? When our commissioners in 1800 went to France to negotiate concerning these claims, and also to secure future peace to American commerce, then, for the first time, as I remember the facts, arose this most remarkable pretension upon the part of France. Then it was that France put forward the claim that we were indebted to her. In the first instance the French commissioners scouted the idea that private citizens had claims against France. They asserted that there had been war between France and the United States, and that our citizens like other must accept the hazards of war. But, as I will show presently, Talleyrand came to their relief with a more diplomatic if not more plausible defense.

What was the condition of France? Her armies were scattered; her treasury was exhausted; she had not a sou with which to pay these claims of $20,000,000 or more. What did she do? Her minister of foreign affairs, Talleyrand, was equal to the emergency. With sublime audacity he trumps up this pretension that our Government was indebted to France in a far greater sum; and upon what ground? Because we had failed to keep our treaty, the very treaty which France had despised; the treaty which she had been breaking from 1793 to 1800; the treaty which had long since ceased to be in effect between the two nations. Then they brought forward this claim. What could our commissioners do? They could not say to Talleyrand or his commissioners, "You are a pack of knaves and rascals. The claim you present is a pretense and a sham." That would not have been diplomatic language. [Laughter.] They were obliged to consider and treat with apparent respect this claim among the many other questions presented. Now I shall not stop here to follow these negotiations.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman speaks of that treaty being of no effect. I do not now remember the history of the matter. I would like to know on what ground the treaty became of no effect.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I should have referred to the formal renunciation of the treaty by our Government. Of course I have not the time to go into details. After our Congress had taken various steps, some of which I have mentioned, to secure the rights of its citizens, in the year 1798 they declared formally this treaty null and void. It had long before ceased to be regarded by the French Government. For five long years they had been violating it every month.

I will pass over the history of the negotiations between these various commissioners. I will only say that finally the test came. The time came when our Government had to decide whether it would prolong the fruitless negotiations or whether it would have peace. However the situation may have been described in technical language, we were then practically in a state of war with France. Blood had been shed upon the seas, provision had been made for the calling forth of armies, and, as I have said, Washington had been called forth from his retirement to command them. The great question presented itself to our Government, Should it longer press these private claims? Should it press them to the extent of involving our young and feeble nation in war once more—in this great continental war? Our Government decided, and decided wisely in my judgment, not to continue further negotiations. Our Government simply refused to enforce these claims at the point of the bayonet. Anxious though the Government had been to secure their payment, it was not willing to pay the fearful price of plunging into this great struggle in which all Europe was engaged.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Suppose it be true, as the gentleman contends, that these claims were not originally valid against the Government of the United States, but were merely trumped up by Talleyrand, and that this Government, for the sake of peace or for the sake of meeting trumped up claims, used the property of private individuals for that purpose, would the Goverment be relieved from the duty of reimbursing such private individuals for what it had taken from them for its own use? Did not the Government become in that way responsible by its own act for these claims as claims against this Government, whether those claims were originally void or not?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. In my judgment our Government did no such thing.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That seems to be the position.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I know that is the position taken by the gentleman.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That is the position I get from the gentleman's argument.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. That is not the position I take. I start out with the statement that you are wrong in assuming that our Government traded claims with France. That is the assumption the friends of this bill always make, and that is where your argument, in my judgment, is weak.

Mr. MILLIKEN. With what did our Government purchase peace?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I do not think our Government did purchase peace. We were in that condition which I have described.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I must have very much misunderstood the gentleman if he did not so state.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. We were in that condition I have described. If it were not open war and manifest war, it certainly was quasi-war. In my judgment the claims of France never would have been presented against our Government except as a sham defense against the just claims we had against them. They were false claims.

Mr. LONG. What then has become of our just claims against France?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Our Government simply refused to carry on this contention so far as to engage in war against France.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question so I may understand his position accurately.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin say that our Government simply ceased to press the claims, or does he admit that our Government expressly abandoned them and did not any further press them?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. It did that precise thing; and no citizen of this Government or any other government, under the rules of international law, can require its government to press private claims until war ensues.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Did our Government expressly, by the terms of the ratification of the convention exchanged in July, 1800—did our Government and the French Government not expressly declare they would not press these claims on either side?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. They did.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. The gentleman says they did.

Mr. CHACE. Permit me for one moment. Now, the gentleman from Wisconsin having said that the two governments did not trade claims, I will read to him a clause of the treaty and ask how the gentleman explains it in connection with his remarks. It is as follows:

> The Government of the United States, having added in its ratification that the convention should be in force for the space of eight years, and having omitted the second article, the Government of the French Republic consents to accept, ratify, and confirm the above convention, with the addition importing that the convention shall be in force for the space of eight years, and with the retrenchment of the second article: Provided, That by this retrenchment the two states renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article.

How can the gentleman say, then, that the Government did not trade claims when we have here a specific declaration that they did make that very convention on that precise basis?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. But that is not the final convention between these two governments. I grant you there was every phase of negotiation during the pendency of these claims. France made her pretensions to our Government, but unless you can establish the fact that France had a valid claim against our Government, then you can not hold our Government liable to these claimants; and why not? The whole argument rests on this assumption: that our Government had a valid consideration for assuming the payment of these claims. If this claim of France against our Government was a false one; if our Government had kept its faith and its treaties; if France was the guilty party, then whatever might have been claimed there was in fact, in justice, and in law no claim against our Government.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me ask the gentlemen whether a disputed consideration is not a valid consideration.

Mr. REED. When accepted.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not true that the two governments considered and pressed their claim against each other?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Our Government would have ceased to press these claims in any event. Our Government would not have plunged its people into war in order to secure these private claims. It had gone, as I have repeated, to the brink of warfare during these years. It had led to bloodshed upon the seas and to commotion and alarm upon land. It had expended more money than is involved in these claims in protecting the claimants during these years. It had gone far enough in sacrificing the public good to the interests of private claimants.

These claims were not the only or the principal subject of negotiations. It was, of course, desirable to secure indemnity for these losses of the past. But it was infinitely more desirable to protect our commerce from future outrage. Our Government simply decided, and decided wisely, that it would not allow its advocacy of these claims to bar forever its peace with France.

And now what is the spectacle which we behold? The claimants and their friends now torture the kindness of the Government in their behalf as a covenant to pay their claims.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] intimated a moment ago by his question that when our Government expressly declared it would no longer press these claims it thereby undertook to pay them. The gentleman forgets that this is not the first time our Government has declined to press similar claims.

The French Government was not the only government which allowed its cruisers to prey upon our commerce. During the same years British cruisers were vying with the French in the same work. They too were capturing our vessels, taking them into their ports, and unlawfully condemning them as prizes of war.

The Government lent to its citizens its aid to secure compensation for those losses, yet years afterward our Government made a treaty with Great Britain and abandoned those claims, and Great Britain has never paid them to this day. I repeat, there is no rule of international law which imposes upon a government any liability to pay such losses as these to its citizens, nor does a government become the guarantor of the collection of such losses by reason of attempting to collect them.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus far spoken purely upon the legal questions involved in this proposition. I grant you, sir, that if these claims are strictly legal, if there is a strict liability—a legal liability—on the part of the Government of the United States to pay them we must pay them, no matter what the cost may be; but, on the other hand, if they appear to be of doubtful legality we are justified in considering other facts which bear upon the equities of the case.

In that view I call attention to the fact that during the period between 1793 and 1800 our merchants were pre-eminently prosperous. That period marked an era of extraordinary prosperity in American commerce. The merchants of this country made money more rapidly than those of any other nation. American products were shipped by them and sold abroad for unprecedented prices. They took great risks, it is true, but they made marvelous gains. They lost a cargo now and then it is true, but still it was the golden era of mercantile prosperity. American ships carried not only the products of our own country but those of all the world, while the vessels of Great Britain and France were being swept from the seas.

Not only that, it was also a golden harvest for the insurers and underwriters. I do not now remember the authority for the statement, but I have read somewhere that the rates of insurance ranged from 15 to 50 per cent. upon these mercantile risks. These insurers assumed for no mean consideration the hazards of these ventures.

And now what are we asked to do? I hold in my hand a book purporting to contain a list of these claims. It is a book containing 275 pages. In looking over the list of claimants I should judge that at least four-fifths of these claimants are designated as underwriters. It would doubtless be safe to say that of the remaining one-fifth of the claims the greater number have gone into the hands of speculators, who have bought them for a few cents or a few mills on the dollar.

Mr. WELLER. I think it is most likely that that is true.

Mr. CURTIN. That is altogether a mistake.

Mr. MORSE. You can not show a single instance where one of these claims has changed hands.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. There are so many interrupting me that I scarcely know to whom I ought to reply.

Mr. CURTIN. I will state to the gentleman that few, if any, of these claims have passed out of the hands of the original parties or their heirs. It is safe to assume that nineteen-twentieths of them are in the hands of the legal representatives of the original claimants.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] will hardly deny the authority of this document which I hold in my hand. It was printed at the instance of these claimants by public money and as a public document. It bears the authority of the Secretary of State. It shows that the great mass of the claims are owned by the insurance companies. I only judge from the usual history of such claims that they have mostly passed into the hands of the brokers and speculators. I will leave the public to decide between us upon that issue.

I hear some one asking, What difference does it make? No difference, I grant you, if there is a strict legal liability to pay. But, sir, gentlemen are invoking the equities in favor of these claims. It is frequently suggested that widows and orphans are among the claimants. How many of these insurance companies are widowed and orphaned I will not venture to guess. But I can predict with safety that the passage of this bill will bring a long-expected harvest to the corporations and speculators and attorneys who are interested in these claims.

Perhaps I may venture the suggestion that the every-day tax-payers of the country are entitled to quite as much sympathy as this class of widows and orphans.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX], in the course of his discussion, tells us of the eminent men who have favored the payment of these claims. It is very true, sir, that many distinguished citizens of this country have favored these claims. The commercial classes of New England have always espoused them, and not even the great men of New England have been beyond that influence. But it is equally true that many distinguished citizens have been opposed to them. Among those who have been prominent in their opposition were Thomas H. Benton and Silas Wright. Among eminent living statesmen who have also opposed them are Mr. Thurman and Mr. SHERMAN.

But, sir, is it not a significant fact that during the lifetime of the men who best understood the question in controversy and the history of these claims, during the years from 1800 to 1826, although these claims were pending before Congress, not one favorable report was made in either branch of Congress. But there was a change when there came a surplus in the Treasury, along in 1833 and 1834 and 1835. When our Treasury was plethoric then the claims came into life and activity. They were then pressed with the same zeal with which they are pressed to-day. But it is most significant that these claims never found favor in the American Congress until they had outlived the men who knew them best.

Mr. COX, of New York. They were never recommended by any President in the early days.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. The gentleman from New York is usually correct, and I have no doubt he is in this instance.

Now, sir, I come to other features of this bill. It is a most harmless looking measure. The gentleman from North Carolina says that all we ask is to let us go into the Court of Claims and adjudicate the question; all we ask is that you shall give us our day in court. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, has it occurred to you that there are tens of thousands of claimants in this country to-day who are making that same modest, humble request? Does it occur to you that if it be the true principle that we should open the Court of Claims to these parties that it will also be right and proper to open it to the tens of thousands of claims against the Government, rebel claims, so called, and all.

That is all they ask, and they could prove their claims, too, in the courts to-day. And why? Our Government has not been keeping track of these claims during the years that have been slipping by. The claimants have. They have been tenderly nursing and guarding them. They have their affidavits filed away. They have their ex parte testimony. And thousands, I might say without exaggeration tens of thousands, of claims are quietly biding their time to enter the Court of Claims. These same ex parte affidavits are strong enough to place these so-called rebel claims on impregnable grounds if that rule is to be applied and if our courts are to be thrown open whenever, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX] says, there is the color of right.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If a man can put his claim on impregnable grounds against this Government, whether he has been a rebel or not, does the gentleman say he should not have the opportunity to do it? Should the Government deny to its own citizens an opportunity to show it owes them?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Go down to the room of the Committee on War Claims——

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not care if there be a hundred million dollars of claims pending. If a government owes an honest claim, I do not care whether the man fought on the one side or the other, he ought to have a hearing, and ought to be paid if the government owes it.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Go down to the room of the Committee on War Claims and you will find innumerable cases. I believe about 3,000 bills of that character have been introduced in this Congress. Some of them are honest claims. Probably the majority of them are without merit, and yet the affidavits are fair on their face.

Establish the rule that this ex parte evidence is to be received, open the courts to these claims, and any court would be compelled to allow the claims, false and perjured though many of the affidavits are.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Can not the courts settle their validity?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. The trouble is the courts would have only one side of the controversy. The rule should be this: Our Government should not open its doors to old, stale claims unless Congress is satisfied those claims are just. The effect of any other rule would be the depletion of the national Treasury.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman talks of "stale" claims. I ask him shall this Government plead the statute of limitations?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. This Government does plead the statute of limitations, and any government that protects the rights of its citizens will do it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. In my country we consider a man pretty mean who pleads the statute of limitations.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Why, sir, your own State pleads it. Every State in this Union pleads it. This Government pleads it to protect its Treasury from false and trumped-up claims.

Now, what are the rules of evidence provided in this bill? Not the rules of evidence of common law; not at all. It gives to the Court of Claims the widest discretion as to how it shall treat these claims. All "suitable" testimony—that is the word which is used; a new word in legal phraseology. They shall receive "all other proper evidence, historic and documentary," old newspapers or old affidavits. All this testimony is ex parte. Therein lies the danger of opening the doors to these claims. Our Government has no testimony. These claimants have carefully preserved and filed theirs.

Now, let me refer to one other feature. I regard this bill as a worse bill by far than those which have been introduced and sometimes passed Congress to meet the veto of the President, appropriating $5,000,000. And why? Because this bill is utterly unlimited in its scope. There is no end to the amount of claims that might be allowed against the Government. There is no sort of limit.

And what is the amount of these claims? The gentleman from North Carolina estimates it at about $12,000,000. He says that is the estimate of the Secretary of State. I have no doubt that is about correct. I know that in 1870 the estimate of Mr. Sumner, who investigated this subject carefully, was twelve and a half million dollars. It was the judgment of Mr. Sumner, too, that if these claims should be allowed, then our Government justly owed interest on them. And I confess I see no answer to that proposition. If they are valid, if they are so valid that they should be paid, then they should draw interest, and the interest on those claims, even at 4 per cent., would bring them to a sum exceeding $50,000,000.

Now I would rather pay $5,000,000 and be done with this business with one appropriation than to open the Court of Claims and allow these claimants to come before it for the next twenty years. They may file their claims for two years, but there is no limit to the time they may pursue them. I would rather pay some given sum than $1,000,000, $2,000,000, or $3,000,000 per year for the next twenty years.

Mr. Speaker, I know the many influences that are at work to secure the passage of this bill. It will probably become a law. But as time shall develop the amount of the expenditures to be incurred by this legislation it may be that the warning which we now give may be remembered, even though not heeded to-day.

Mr. RICE. I desire to occupy a very few moments in considering the remarks which have been made by the gentleman who has just taken his seat.

These claims have been before the Congress and the Government too long and have been urged too prominently to be now disregarded or brushed aside as unimportant and worthless, or as "perjured" claims, as the gentleman has called them. If they are valid claims against the Government they ought to have the opportunity, which this bill seeks to afford them, of having their day in court, and being audited, that it may be ascertained upon what they rest, what is their amount, and to whom, if to anybody, they are due. That is all that this bill provides. If these claims, or any of them, be just claims against the United States (which we seek to ascertain), then the United States ought in the first place to allow the claimants to produce their testimony and make manifest their claims, and if the validity of the claims is sustained, then the United States ought to provide for their payment whether they amount to $5,000,000, $15,000,000, or even $50,000,000.

The gentleman from Wisconsin says that the question is whether the United States ever used these claims for its own benefit; and he says, properly—so I understand him—that if that be the fact, then he admits that the United States ought to meet, liquidate, and settle them.

Now, sir, we go back to the close of the Revolutionary war, and we find that that war was won by this country by the aid of the French Government. We made a treaty with France at that time, the provisions of which were a guarantee on the part of France to the struggling young Republic of the United States—not then the United States, but this American Republic—and a guarantee in return by the Republic to France. France guaranteed to this country liberty. France said: We will send you money, our fleets shall go out upon the ocean to fight for you, our soldiers shall join with your soldiers, we will fight out your contests until you have won your freedom, and we will guarantee that freedom to you thenceforward. And the United States said to France: In return for these great favors to us, we, the United States, will guarantee to France from this time and forever, against all hostile powers, her possessions in America as well as those to which she shall obtain title by a treaty of peace. In addition, we gave to the ships of France certain rights in our ports.

These were the mutual guarantees of France to the United States and, in return, of the United States to France. In performance of the guarantee of France she spent $250,000,000. Her ships were sunk; her soldiers shed their blood on land and on the ocean that we might be free in fulfillment of her pledge. We obtained our freedom, and we obtained it at the cost of these great outlays and sacrifices by France. Then, not long after, the hour of France's need came. Stimulated by our example she flung to the breeze the banner of a free republic and sought to maintain it against the embattled powers of Europe. Then England, the power against which France had guaranteed our liberty, joined those that were seeking to crush the young French Republic, and sent out her fleets to conquer, one after another, the remaining possessions of France upon this continent and around it which we had guaranteed forever to France.

England also established severe provisions against neutral commerce and forced France to adopt like provisions for her own protection. Thus the claims arise for the violation of the treaty made between us and France. France broke that treaty, being forced to do it by England; by seizing our ships, which under the treaty should have been protected, and it was for the seizure of those ships and the damages to their owners—those who, as the gentleman says, were building up the young commerce of our country—it was out of those seizures and those spoliations that the claims arose which Washington sought to enforce against the French Republic. Those are the claims which are the subject of this bill to-day. During the decade from 1790 to 1800 our commerce was despoiled upon the waters by Spain and by England and by France—by France in violation of this treaty which she had made with us, and which by the necessities of her position she was forced to violate. Our ship-owners, the men engaged in commerce, trusted to the promises of the Government to protect them and to obtain them compensation for the injuries that they received from the powers which were contending with each other in Europe. That reparation was obtained from England and from Spain, and the only American merchants who suffered during those years and to whom compensation has not yet been made were those who suffered from the French spoliations committed in violation of the treaty to which I have referred. Now, why have not those men been paid as well as the others? That is the question. They had valid claims. Their claims were under the protection of our Government, under a guarantee that they should be remunerated. Why have not those claims been paid? Why has not the merchant of Georgia, of Massachusetts, of Connecticut, or of Maryland, who lost his property by the spoliations of French cruisers between 1790 and 1800—why has not he been paid as well as those who lost their property through the depredations committed by Great Britain or by Spain?

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICE. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have in my hand the message of the President of the United States transmitting these claims, and, opening the list of claims casually at page 185, I find that every single claim upon the page is the claim of an underwriter; and the same appears to be true of almost any page you look at. In view of this fact I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fair inference that the merchants depended upon underwriters rather than upon the Government?

Mr. MORSE. If the claims are right they ought to be paid.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not now arguing the question of subrogation; but the gentleman [Mr. RICE] has insisted that these are claims of merchants, and that they ought to be paid because they are the claims of merchants who have been relying upon this Government; whereas it appears from this document that they are largely the claims of underwriters.

Mr. RICE. In the first place, it does not affect the justice of the claims——

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not discussing the legality of the claims; I am not raising any question as to the doctrine of subrogation, which I did not understand the gentleman to be discussing. I understood him to be stating by way of persuasion, as a matter of fact, that these claims were the bona fide claims of merchants and their heirs.

Mr. MORSE. If my colleague [Mr. RICE] will allow me, I would like to state to the gentleman from Georgia that, having taken a little interest in this bill, I have received personally more than three hundred letters from individual claimants, and not a single one from any corporation. I state that upon my honor.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. RICE. I think I must object to further interruption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RICE. I do not want to have an outside discussion "injected into the belly" of my speech; that is all. [Laughter.] But the gentleman may proceed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not care to interrupt the gentleman further. I was simply about to say, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] has received a great many letters urging the claims of individuals, that the document from which I read came from the highest source, the President of the United States; and by that document it appears that these are not all claims of merchants.

Mr. RICE. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand, I suppose, the same document to which the gentleman refers. I see here some pages of claims of underwriters. I see also many pages of claims of individuals not underwriters. The bill provides that the court shall report who are the holders of the claims—whether underwriters or those individuals whose ancestors suffered the losses. I care not whether some of these claims come from individuals or not. Hundreds of them are held by the descendants of men who owned the ships, these claims having been kept in attics or elsewhere from that time to this in the hope that some time or other the Government would redeem its faith and pay to these people what their forefathers lost for the sake of the country. I speak for that class. Let the few underwriters over whom my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] stumbles so badly pass. Congress may set these claims aside, if it sees fit, after the report of the court is made.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. And this bill provides that it shall be ascertained who are the holders of these claims.

Mr. RICE. But let us do justice to the grandsons and the granddaughters of the men who kept our flag afloat from 1790 to 1800 at the sacrifice in many cases of their entire fortunes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to come back to the point of my argument, I say these were valid claims against France; that the losses were honestly sustained; that the claims should have been cared for by the Government in seeking remuneration from France. Did this Government do that? It sent commissioners, one board after another, to France—to what purpose? To secure payment of these very claims. Our Government deemed them of importance; it deemed them just; and it sought to collect them. Why, then, did it not collect them? Because these commissioners were met by France with this counter-guarantee on our part in the treaty; and the representatives of the French Government said to our representatives, "Now, gentlemen, are you willing to perform your part of this agreement? If you are, we will talk with you about performing our part. We agreed that your ships should be free, that they should be protected on the seas by us as the ships of a friendly power. We have been obliged by our necessities to violate that agreement, and you have suffered loss at our hands. You agreed that the islands along your coast and all the American possessions of France should be protected to France, by your Treasury, by your armies, and by your fleets. Are you ready to do it? There are the fleets of England sweeping down upon Antigua and the other islands belonging to France; are you ready to send out your fleets to protect those islands to us? If so, then let us talk it over and see how many millions we owe your despoiled claimants and how much you shall do to protect us in that which you guaranteed to us."

Our representatives wrote back to the Government which had accredited them, "We do not dare to enter upon that discussion; it will cost us more to perform our part of the guarantee than we lose by the violation on the part of France. We did not dare to measure the damages by our breach with the damages by the breach on the part of France."

But when at last the agreement was reached Napoleon wrote as a condition of agreement that France should be relieved from the payment of these claims and that the United States should pay them. That was the agreement Bonaparte required as the ground of his consenting to the arrangement, and the treaty with that provision was returned to this country.

The Senate struck it out and said we will not make the exchange, we will not assume to pay those claims; and the treaty went back to France with the provision which Bonaparte had incorporated upon it stricken out. But Bonaparte had just come from Marengo and he would not withdraw the proposition which he had made. He wrote again on the treaty that the guarantees must be offset one against the other, and with that renewed condition the treaty was returned to the United States and was ratified by the Senate. And thus these claims of our merchants were made to offset the claims of France against the United States to carry out the guarantee she had made in the treaty to protect the possessions of France on this continent and about this continent forever against all comers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is all I have to say. These claimants suffered loss from France by the violation of France of her treaty stipulations with this country. Their claims against France were waived by this country, which had recognized their validity and their justice and were used by this country to buy itself off from performing very important duties on its part, duties which would have cost millions of treasure and thousands of lives. The one was offset against the other. Our nation availed itself of the claims of these merchants and business men. It used them for its own profit; and now, after the lapse of three-quarters of a century, the representatives of these claims come and simply ask, "Give us an opportunity to show the basis upon which the claims we make against the United States rest. At this late day permit us at least to show in the face of the world what our fathers sacrificed and upon what grounds they made the sacrifice, whether in the interest or at the expense of the country on its pledge to remunerate them or not."

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD].

Mr. BROADHEAD. Mr. Speaker, this same subject was before the Judiciary Committee, and I was instructed unanimously to make report by that committee in favor of a similar bill. I, therefore, am glad of the opportunity of saying a few words in favor of the bill now under consideration which has passed the Senate, and which contains with one exception substantially the provisions reported in the bill from the Judiciary Committee.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JONES], who has made the first objection to the provisions of this bill and the adjustment of these claims, presses his chief objection upon the ground that when the treaty of 1800 was ratified between the United States and the French Republic, France had no valid claim for indemnity against the Government of the United States. I am not here, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of defending the claims of France against our own Government arising during the period between 1793 and 1800. It is not necessary to do so. It is begging the whole question to say there were no valid claims in favor of the French Government against the United States; but whether valid or invalid, there were claims which became the subject of negotiation between the plenipotentiaries of the two powers. And the gentleman forgets, when he says there is no valid claim, that by the treaty with Great Britain, adopted under the negotiations of Mr. Jay in 1794, there was a provision opening the ports of this Republic to the prizes of Great Britain taken in the war then waging between the two governments of France and Great Britain.

The gentleman forgets there is a provision in the treaty of 1778 by which it was stipulated that no such privileges should be given to the British nation. The gentleman forgets that prior to the adoption of the treaty of 1800 the West India Islands were lost to the Republic of France, although by the provisions of the treaty of 1778 it was guaranteed on the part of the American Republic that she would aid and assist the French Republic; in other words, that she would guarantee, to use the language of the treaty of 1778, the French possessions in America, including the West India Islands.

That these were valid claims we can see by reference to these facts that came under consideration in the negotiations which took place between the plenipotentiaries of the two powers in Paris when the terms of the treaty were being discussed; that these claims were set up against our Government, that they were urged against the Government of the United States at the same time that we urged against the French people the payment of the damages which our citizens had suffered by reason of the decree of the French Republic renouncing the doctrine which France and the United States had announced and maintained, that free ships made free goods, to the effect that they could no longer be enforced by the French Republic, because she was then beset by all the powers of Europe, and it was necessary she should exercise the same power over the commerce upon the high seas which the British Government exercised by claiming the right to seize goods destined to the enemy's port, whether contraband of war or not. By the provisions of the treaty of 1778 they could not have been taken. Free ships made free goods according to the conditions of that treaty, and it was not legitimate according to the liberal policy first announced by these two governments, France and the United States, in 1778, that free ships made free goods; a principle promotive of commercial prosperity and civilization the world over, and which had been announced by them for the first time in that treaty; I say it was not according to that liberal policy that such seizures were permissible.

I say then, Mr. Speaker, that there were claims against the Government; and to show you, sir, that these claims were urged by both powers when the negotiations were going on in regard to the treaty of 1800, I call the attention of the House to the instructions given by Mr. Pickering, then Secretary of State, to our commissioners at Paris, and to the further instructions on the part of the French Republic to the commissioners representing that government at the conference, to show that these claims were to be taken into consideration in the pending negotiations. The very first instruction given by Mr. Pickering to Oliver Ellsworth, William Richardson Davie, and William Vans Murray is in the following words:

> First. At the opening of the negotiation you will inform the French ministers that the United States expects from France, as an indispensable condition of the treaty, a stipulation to make the citizens of the United States full compensation for all losses and damages which they shall have sustained by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and other property, under color of authority or commissions from the French Republic or its agents. And all captures and condemnations are deemed irregular or illegal when contrary to the law of nations generally received and acknowledged in Europe, and to the stipulations in the treaty of amity and commerce of the 6th of February, 1778, fairly and ingenuously interpreted, while that treaty remained in force.

These are the instructions given to our plenipotentiaries. Now, a letter dated Paris, 23d Thermidor, in the year 8 (August 11, 1800), addressed by the French plenipotentiaries, Bonaparte, Fleurieu, and Roederer, to our ministers, Messrs. Ellsworth, Davie, and Murray, stated that they had received the following instructions from their government:

> In the first place they will insist upon the principle already laid down in their former note, namely, that the treaties which united France and the United States are not broken; that even war could not have broken them. But that the state of misunderstanding which has existed for some time between France and the United States by the act of some agents rather than by the will of the respective governments has not been a state of war, at least on the side of France. * * * Thus the first proposition of the ministers of France is to stipulate a full and entire recognition of the treaties and the reciprocal engagement of compensation for damages resulting on both sides for their infraction.

So that the main subject of consideration between these ministers was the question not simply as to whether they should adopt the other provisions of the treaty, but whether these claims for indemnity before them of one government against the other should be considered and adjusted; and it was the first proposition to be considered, according to the instructions given by the two governments to their representatives intrusted with the negotiations.

That I say was the main subject under consideration, and it will not do to say that the claim of France was not a good or valid claim. It was a claim that was the subject of negotiations between the two governments at this conference—a claim which she would not remit or surrender except upon condition of the surrender by the Government of the United States of the claims of Americans against France by reason of spoliations upon their commerce between the years 1793 and 1800, for these were the claims, the just and valid claims, of our Government on behalf of American citizens against the French Republic.

But, sir, let us see what was done after these instructions were given. But before calling the attention of the House to that I want to show another fact. This treaty was submitted to the Senate in February, 1801, during the last month of the administration of Mr. Adams. The Senate refusing to agree to the second article, it was again referred to our commissioners at Paris, and fully ratified by them on the 31st day of July, 1801, and was not promulgated by the President until the 19th day of December, 1801, during Mr. Jefferson's administration. But just before its final adoption and ratification between the ministers plenipotentiary, and before the negotiations in regard to this matter had been completed in France, Mr. Murray, one of our commissioners, wrote to Mr. Madison, the Secretary of State, the following letter:

PARIS, July 15, 1801.

SIR: From a conversation which I had two days since with one of the French ministers, I understand that they are deliberating upon the choice of one of the two following modes of ratification:

To ratify on condition of reciprocal abandonment of pretensions under the second article, or to ratify on our terms, but with a declaration incorporated in the language, that they consider the suppression of that article as an abandonment of all claims and pretensions under it. I can answer for the substance only, as it is from conversation that I learn it.

I believe, sir, and wish that they will pursue the last mode. Nothing will be done on my part to affirm their construction of the motives which led the United States to the suppression.

Then on the next week Mr. Murray writes:

PARIS, July 23, 1801.

SIR: At length they will ratify, but with a declaration in the body of their act that the omission of the second article, and the addition of the new one of limitation, to both of which they will formally assent, are to be considered as an abandonment respectively of the pretensions under the second article.

Convinced, sir, as I am that nothing better can be gained, and confiding in a liberal judgment in Government upon the situation in which I am placed, I shall exchange upon these terms.

In a very few days I trust I shall be able to inclose to you the instrument exchanged.

I am, &c.,

W. V. MURRAY.

Hon. Mr. MADISON, Secretary of State.

And thereupon they did on the 21st of July exchange ratifications at Paris. Here is the treaty. The second article is the article in dispute, and the question is whether under the provisions of the second article of the treaty, or rather because of its suppression, these claims have any legitimate existence. Here is the final ratification to which Mr. Murray referred in his letter of July 23, signed by the First Consul of France:

Bonaparte, First Consul, in the name of the French people: The Consuls of the Republic, having seen and examined the convention, concluded, agreed to, and signed at Paris, the 8th Vendémiaire, ninth year of the French Republic (30th September, 1800), by the citizens Joseph Bonaparte, Fleurieu, and Roederer, counsellors of state, in virtue of the full powers which have been given to them to this effect, with Messieurs Ellsworth, Davie, and Murray, ministers plenipotentiary of the United States, equally furnished with full powers, the tenor of which convention follows. (Here follows the treaty):

Approves the above convention in all and each of the articles which are therein contained; declares that it is accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and promises that it shall be inviolably observed.

The Government of the United States, having added, in its ratification, that the convention should be in force for the space of eight years, and having omitted the second article, the Government of the French Republic consents to accept, ratify, and confirm the above convention with the addition, importing that the convention shall be in force for the space of eight years and with the retrenchment of the second article: Provided, That by this retrenchment the two states renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article.

Now that second article is as follows:

ARTICLE II. The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree at present respecting the treaty of alliance of February 6, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce, of the same date, and the convention of 14th of November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time, and until they may have agreed upon these points the said treaties and convention shall have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows.

And then it goes on to state these regulations in the other articles of the treaty. When the treaty which was ratified by the ministers plenipotentiary had been first submitted to the Senate of the United States they approved the treaty, except the second article, which they insisted should be stricken out. Of course that required the approval of the French nation, because it was a change of the treaty as originally agreed upon; and it was resubmitted to France, and agreed to finally by the representatives of the Federal Republic at that time upon the condition that there should be a mutual renunciation of the claims arising under the treaty of 1788.

What were those claims? Why the claims on the part of the French Government against the United States Government for its violation of the treaty of 1788 and the counter-claim of the United States Government against the French Government for acts committed since the treaty of 1788 and during the wars which were waged from 1793 to 1800 with the monarchs of Europe on the part of the French Republic. Of these claims there was then a mutual renunciation.

The Government of the United States had in its hands as trustee for the merchants and other claimants of indemnity for depredations committed on their property by the French nation the prosecution and recognition of those claims. If an individual or a nation has in its hands claims belonging to another, and it settles those claims by giving up claims of its own in consideration of that settlement, by the plainest principles of law, whatever may be the amount of those legitimate claims thus settled, the party who has used them as a means for satisfying obligations of his own is under the highest duty, according to the principles of law and morals, to reimburse to the party for whom those claims were preferred the amounts so settled. Our Government holds the position of trustee for those claimants, and it is their bounden duty to see that these claims are paid. And that is all that this bill asks. I do not put it on the ground that this is a mere inquiry; that they may be ascertained by the Court of Claims and then paid or not at our discretion. I put it on the ground that these are just and equitable claims, due by the plainest principles of law and justice.

Now, as to these pretensions referred to in the second article of the treaty, I would like to call the attention of the House more particularly to their nature. What were the pretensions or claims thus renounced? As to their relative value to the two nations it is not necessary to inquire. But if the claims preferred by the United States against France were for indemnities for losses sustained by private citizens of the United States by reason of the wrongful action of the French Government, and our Government surrendered these claims for a consideration deemed at that time sufficient, the obligation rests on our Government to make good those losses to its own citizens, and no lapse of time can weaken the force of the obligation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROADHEAD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask the question for information, as I am seeking information on this question. Does the evidence sustain the claim now made, and made in the report of the committee, that the claims included in this bill were among the claims assumed or intended to be assumed by this Government in the treaty of 1800?

Mr. BROADHEAD. The gentleman's question, as I understand it, is, Were the claims intended to be assumed——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Were these a part of the claims assumed or intended to be assumed by the treaty of 1800?

Mr. BROADHEAD. That is the proposition I am undertaking to demonstrate. There were no other claims on the part of the United States except the claims for spoliations committed on its citizens.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certain of those claims I understood were allowed and certain others have not been allowed.

Mr. BROADHEAD. By the fifth article of the treaty of 1800 there was a provision made for the settlement of certain debts, not claims, but debts between the Government of France and citizens of the United States.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. They were simply adjudicated claims, were they not?

Mr. BROADHEAD. Yes, sir; they were adjudicated claims or debts. The fifth article of the treaty expressly excepts any other claims from its operation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But did not that treaty include all claims which France had ever admitted to be just claims against her?

Mr. BROADHEAD. Admitted to be just?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes. Did not that treaty include all the claims which France had ever admitted to be just claims against the Republic of France?

Mr. BROADHEAD. It included all claims for indemnities for seizures which had not been adjusted, as the language of the second article which I have just read shows, and by the fifth article which was retained it included all debts due to private citizens.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not all claims; but all claims that France admitted to be just.

Mr. BROADHEAD. France agreed to adjust them, and they were in process of adjustment when the treaty was made.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But my question is, Did not that treaty include all the claims that France admitted to be just?

Mr. BROADHEAD. What treaty do you mean?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The treaty of 1803.

Mr. BROADHEAD. By the provisions of the Louisiana treaty these claims are expressly excluded, and nothing was provided for by that treaty except debts, the whole of which had not been paid, and judgments for captures where the council of prizes had ordered restitution. It did not include pending claims for spoliation.

Mr. EATON (in his seat). Entirely. It has nothing to do with them.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I know that Mr. Pierce in his veto message uses the argument that the gentleman now uses; but I think it is easily answered, and I think he failed to refer to that article of the treaty and relied simply on the preamble. The fifth section of the treaty of 1800 expressly excludes all these claims. I will read it for the gentleman's satisfaction. It is as follows:

The debts contracted by one of the two nations with individuals of the other, or by the individuals of one with the individuals of the other, shall be paid, or the payment may be prosecuted in the same manner as if there had been no misunderstanding between the two states. But this clause shall not extend to indemnities claimed on account of captures or confiscations.

Mr. HUNT. Is that in the treaty of 1800? It is in the treaty of 1802 or 1803, is it not?

Mr. BROADHEAD. There is a similar provision in the treaty of 1803. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio means to make the argument that these claims were settled by the treaty of 1803.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I was not referring to the treaty of 1803.

Mr. BROADHEAD. You mean the Louisiana purchase?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No, sir; the treaty of September 30, 1800.

Mr. BROADHEAD. Well, I have read the fifth article of the treaty, which shows that those claims were expressly excepted. When that treaty was submitted to the Senate of the United States they agreed to ratify it, with the exception of the second article, which they proposed to strike out, and it was sent back. Bonaparte agreed to the proposal of the Senate to strike out the second article, provided it was understood that the claims of the respective nations were mutually abandoned. This fifth article was still in the treaty in regard to debts, and remained in full force, excluding these claims, because they were undertaken to be provided for by the second article, which was expunged, and in lieu of it was adopted the stipulation made between France and the United States that they should be mutually abandoned. The fact was that there were indemnities mutually due by the two governments, so conceded by their ministers plenipotentiary when they agreed to the adoption of the second article, as will be seen by reading that article. In 1826, when for the first time the history of these claims was fully investigated and made public, and when was first made public the correspondence which took place between the two governments between the years 1793 and 1800; in other words, when the first public light was thrown upon the history of these transactions, then it was that Mr. Clay made his report as Secretary of State.

As Mr. Clay says in his communication as Secretary of State of the date of May 20, 1826:

> The two contracting parties thus agreed, by the retrenchment of the second article, mutually to renounce the respective pretensions which were the object of that article. The pretensions of the United States to which allusion is thus made arose out of the spoliations, under color of French authority, in contravention to law and existing treaties. Those of France sprung from the treaty of alliance of the 6th of February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th of November, 1788.

Each of these pretensions for indemnities mutually due and mutually claimed.

> The amount of the indemnities due to citizens of the United States was very large, and on the other hand the obligation was great (to specify no other French pretensions) under which the United States were placed in the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance of the 6th of February, 1778, by which they were bound forever to guarantee from that time the then possessions of the Crown of France in America, as well as those which it might acquire by the future treaty of peace with Great Britain, all these possessions having been, it is believed, conquered at, or not long after, the exchange of ratifications by the arms of Great Britain from France.

Of course I have no censure to pass upon our own Government. The Republic was then in its infancy. It was but shortly after the Revolution, and it was not thought politic, because self-preservation is the first law of nature among nations as well as among individuals—it was not thought politic that the Republic should by any act of hers seem to become a party to the gigantic war then raging on the continent of Europe, and she would have done so if she had undertaken to carry out the provisions under which she was bound by the treaty of 1778 with France.

Let us see what were those pretensions which became the subject of negotiation between the two states and were referred to in the second article in the convention of 1800:

The treaty of 1788 between France and the United States provides as follows:

> The two parties guarantee mutually, from the present time and forever, against all other powers, to wit, the United States to his most Christian Majesty, the present possessions of the Crown of France in America, as well as those which it may acquire by the future treaty of peace. And his most Christian Majesty guarantees on his part to the United States their liberty, sovereignty, and independence, absolute and unlimited, as well in matters of government as commerce; and also their possessions and the additions or conquests that their Confederation may obtain during the war from any of the domains now or heretofore possessed by Great Britain in North America.

It was further stipulated that "in case of a rupture between France and England the reciprocal guarantee shall have full force and effect the moment such war shall break out."

At the same time a treaty of amity and commerce was entered into between France and the United States, by which the United States undertook, first, to protect and defend by their ships of war and convoy any and all vessels belonging to French subjects, so long as they hold the same course, against all attacks, force, and violence, in the same manner as they ought to protect and defend the vessels of the citizens of the United States (Articles 6, 7). Secondly. To open their ports to French ships of war and privateers with their prizes, and to close them against those of any power at war with France, except when driven by stress of weather. Thirdly. To allow French privateers to fit their ships, to sell what they had taken, or in any other manner whatsoever to exchange their ships, merchandise, or any other lading; but privateers at enmity with France are forbidden even to victual in the ports of the United States.

Now, there is no question of our having violated those provisions of the treaty. I do not think that it was unwise to do it. France by her own act had renounced one of the provisions of the treaty, having been forced to do it by the conduct of Great Britain at that time. She had renounced the doctrine that "free ships make free goods;" and we had suffered by reason of that renunciation. There were violations on both sides; and it was because of this that those negotiations were carried on at Paris in 1800. The obligations assumed by France and the United States were onerous, but so far as the United States were concerned they were a part of the price paid for American independence. But for this treaty and the aid given by France to the suffering and struggling soldiers of the war of Independence the cause of American liberty and of popular government might indeed have perished from the earth.

In the light of the events which followed it would not be possible to estimate the value of this treaty to the American people and to the cause of free government throughout the world. Lafayette stood by the side of Washington, the blood of the French people mingled with that of our own illustrious soldiers, and the treasures of France were freely offered and given in aid of our suffering countrymen until the army of Cornwallis surrendered at Yorktown and the war closed by a recognition of our national independence.

No event in modern history is marked with more significance or has had a greater influence upon the destinies of our race.

Let us glance briefly at the events which followed. Not many years after the recognition of our national independence, and the establishment of our system of popular government upon a sure foundation, the French people, following our example, also established a republic, and then it was that monarchical Europe arrayed itself against republican France; in 1793 Great Britain joined the alliance. It was a war of gigantic proportions—such as the world had not seen for centuries preceding it. And it was natural that our infant Republic, weighed down by the debts of the Revolution, should have desired, if possible, to keep aloof from the conflict. The proclamation of neutrality on the part of the United States was adopted on the 22d of April, 1793. The English navy swept the seas, and France was deprived of her West India possessions. France claimed privileges in American ports which it was held were in conflict with obligations due to other belligerent powers. This our Government could not assent to without making it a party to the conflict which was then shaking Europe to its center. The principle announced in the twenty-third article of the treaty of 1778, that free ships make free goods and that subsistence and supplies were not contraband of war unless destined for a blockaded port, was found to operate disadvantageously to France, because Great Britain, one of her chief enemies, asserted under the law of nations the right to capture as contraband supplies destined for an enemy's port.

The Government of France thereupon issued a decree on the 9th of May, 1793, to the effect that "the French people are no longer permitted to fulfill toward the neutral powers in general the vows they have so often manifested, and which they constantly make for the full and entire liberty of commerce and navigation," and that nation authorized the seizure of neutral vessels bound to an enemy's port in the same manner as was done by Great Britain, and this decree was to continue in force until the enemies of France should desist from depredations on neutral vessels bound to the ports of France. Then followed the embargo, by which a large number of our vessels were detained at Bordeaux, the seizure of British goods on board of American vessels and of the property of American citizens under the claim that it belonged to English subjects, and even the imprisonment of American citizens captured on the high seas. From 1793 to 1797 our Government used every means to obtain redress by negotiation. The controversy went so far that for a time diplomatic relations between France and the United States were suspended. On the 28th of May, 1798, an act of Congress was passed for the employment of the American Navy against the armed vessels of France hovering on our coast, and another act in June prohibiting commercial intercourse between the two nations; another on July 27, 1798, abrogating the treaties between France and the United States. There was no declaration of war by which every citizen of one nation becomes the enemy of every citizen of the other, but there was in fact a partial maritime war, and this condition of things was only terminated by the treaty of Paris of September 30, 1800.

Certainly the claims which originated prior to the abrogation of the treaty of 1778, which abrogation did not occur until 1798, have nothing to do with the claims originating prior to the passage of the act of Congress abolishing those treaties, even if one party to a contract can by its voluntary act deprive the other of their rights under that contract.

The claims now under consideration originated between 1793 and 1800. They were originally claims against the French Government. They were the subject of negotiation between the plenipotentiaries of the two powers which preceded the ratification of the treaty. As between the two nations they were adjusted by that treaty, and the citizens of the United States who were the sufferers from the spoliations of France upon American commerce have lost all claim upon the government of that country, and by the plainest principles of law and justice the United States became liable to indemnify them for their losses. So thought some of the most illustrious statesmen and jurists of that day.

I could refer to their statements, but it is unnecessary. Under the provisions of this bill the whole subject must undergo a full investigation before anything can be allowed, and even then it is subject to the final action of Congress. By the first section of the bill the claimant is authorized to apply by petition to the Court of Claims within two years from the passage of the act.

Notice of all petitions presented under the act are to be served on the Attorney-General of the United States, who is authorized to attend to these claims on the part of the Government, and to resist all claims presented by all proper legal defenses, and the court is to decide upon the validity of the claims according to the rules of law, municipal and international, and the treaties of the United States applicable to the same, and to report to Congress all conclusions of fact and law as in their judgment may affect the liability of the United States therefor.

Gentlemen say that these claims have slept for a long period of time. They were first presented in 1802, when Mr. Giles made a report in their favor; but no action was taken, and it was not proposed to take any action They were presented again by Mr. Marion, of South Carolina, in 1807, who referred to the report of Mr. Giles and the facts contained therein; but as he was instructed merely to inquire into the equity of those claims against the United States, no bill was introduced for the purpose of adjusting the claims. But he did report in the strongest terms that the claims were valid against the Government of the United States. I have here his report, made in 1807; and the language is as strong as it can be in holding that by virtue of the abrogation of the treaty of 1800 and the substitution of the proviso inserted by Talleyrand, the minister of Napoleon, and adopted by him, the claims of the two nations were mutually released, and that the Government of the United States became liable to pay them to her own citizens.

I shall not refer to them again. I say that the subject of these claims never met with thorough investigation until 1826. I hold in my hand the report made upon them at that time to the Senate of the United States after this thorough investigation.

Mr. Holmes made a report in their favor to the Senate of the date of February 8, 1827. Then it was that the origin and history of the claims and all the correspondence between the two governments from 1793 to 1800, and the instructions to our ministers and the notes of their proceedings, were published and preserved in the fifth volume of the Executive Documents, first session Nineteenth Congress, which I have before me.

Mr. Holmes had all these documents before him. He gave a history of the claims; and appended to his report is a list of the claimants whose claims had been filed in the Department.

Gentlemen make the objection, "Why have not these claims been allowed?" I asked why have not a great many claims which every man must admit to be just been allowed by the Congress of the United States? Has Congress time to pass upon all these claims? Does it pass upon one-half of those presented? And are not the half which fail to receive action just as meritorious as those passed upon? I have shown by a plain statement of historical facts that the claims are founded in justice, and surely the claims of justice upon an honorable and honest government preferred by its own citizens can never die so long as the government itself is permitted to exist; and so far as the objections are concerned there is not one of them which can not be presented and passed upon by the Court of Claims when the petitions of the claimants are presented before that court; for all that this bill proposes to do is to open the tribunals of the country to these claimants for a hearing upon the principles of law, municipal and international, and under the provisions of the treaties to which I have referred, and surely this can not be denied them. This much is due not only to our own citizens, but to this Government and to the people of France also, whose government has long since paid to ours the indemnities due to its citizens—not in money, it is true—but in a mutual release of obligations.

The treaty of 1800 was to our people a most important event and of almost inestimable value. It relieved us from the enormous obligations of the treaties of 1778 and the convention of 1788; it relieved our commerce from the dangers of further spoliation on the part of France in the gigantic war then raging on land and sea between the French Republic and the allied powers; but, above all, it established a permanent peace between the two nations and a restoration of that friendship which had been so instrumental in the establishment of our national independence. And permit me here to say that it must be gratifying to us to know that although for a period of seven years, from 1793 to 1800, there were serious dissensions between the two nations—a suspension of diplomatic intercourse, a recall of ministers, embargoes, and acts of spoliation on the part of France by which millions of property of our citizens were destroyed, and acts of hostility between the armed vessels of the two nations amounting almost to a state of war—yet after the treaty of peace and for a period of now more than three-quarters of a century, with one slight interruption, the utmost cordiality and friendship have prevailed, a friendship which has but recently manifested itself on the part of the French people in another act destined not only to perpetuate the memory of their early friendship for us, but to assure the world that republican France recognizes the fact that here in this free land of ours the light of true liberty was first enkindled; for at the entrance to the harbor of the great commercial metropolis of our country is within a few weeks to be erected a colossal statue of Liberty enlightening the world, a gift of the French people to the people of the United States. It will be a beacon-light to the storm-tossed mariner, assuring him of a safe harbor; it will shine afar among the nations, showing to the oppressed of other lands the pathway to the land where freedom has found a home.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I desire to ascertain how long the opponents of this bill desire to discuss it. I propose at the end of one hour to call the previous question.

Mr. CURTIN. Why not call it now?

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will not call the previous question at this time.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not know that I wish to occupy the floor at all; but there are other gentlemen who may want to speak.

Mr. HUNT. There will be an hour for debate after the previous question is called.

Mr. BLOUNT. An hour belonging to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. EATON. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JONES], who is opposed to the bill, has some time remaining which he can yield.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I have agreed to yield it to other gentlemen.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Well, I give notice that I shall call the previous question at the expiration of half an hour.

Mr. HUNT. Say one hour.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope this limitation of debate will not be insisted upon.

Mr. CURTIN (to Mr. COX, of North Carolina). Call the previous question now.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I do not want to press this matter with unnecessary haste; but I desire to ascertain the wishes of gentlemen in regard to the debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JONES] has twenty-three minutes.

Mr. CURTIN (to Mr. COX, of North Carolina). At the end of that time call the previous question.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I will call it at the end of twenty-three minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Say one hour.

Mr. CURTIN. I do not consent to one hour. If the disposition of the House is to pass this bill, we must not fritter time away.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin has twenty-three minutes remaining.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope gentlemen on the other side will not insist on limiting the debate to twenty-three minutes.

Mr. CURTIN. There will be an hour allowed after the previous question has been called.

Mr. BLOUNT. But that will be given to those who favor the passage of the bill.

Mr. CURTIN. It will be divided equally between the two sides.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is important that the House should determine whether it is proper to order the previous question in the first place.

Mr. CURTIN. When this time is exhausted it will be soon enough.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor for twenty-three minutes.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen who have charge of this bill seem to be anxious to pass it this afternoon. Considering this measure has been in the American Congress off and on since 1802, we might perhaps claim a little more time in opposition, especially as it has had on two occasions, in the time of the Presidency of Mr. Polk and in the time of the Presidency of Mr. Pierce, on both occasions very stringent and rational vetoes.

Now, this bill involves how much? It was stated in the veto of President Polk that it involved then five millions of money. That was in 1846.

Mr. CHACE rose.

Mr. COX, of New York. No; I have only five minutes.

Mr. CHACE. Has this bill ever been vetoed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. COX, of New York. This bill involves $5,000,000 ultimately. I know what the gentleman from Rhode Island means.

Mr. CHACE. Certainly.

Mr. COX, of New York. This bill is to draw all the cases into the Court of Claims.

Mr. CHACE. And that is a material difference.

Mr. COX, of New York. Oh, yes! The Germans have a proverb that if the devil gets hold of a hair of your head he will drag in the whole of your body. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CHACE. And that is what the gentleman is trying to do now.

Mr. COX, of New York. It is an entering-wedge. If you begin with this bill, referring these claims to the Court of Claims, I know, although there may be an appeal from the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court, it is always fixed in appropriation bills to pay these judgments. And I appeal from the lack of sincerity on behalf of my Quaker friend from Rhode Island to the fidelity and earnestness of my friend from Missouri, who says outright that he does not place his argumentation on any such ground as that. He says that he argues it on the legality, on the equity of the cases, and not upon any presumed power over it in the Court of Claims. Why, I believe the State Department has said that this involves $12,000,000, and more than that if you add the interest, and I know, in some cases at least, the Committee on Foreign Affairs——

Mr. HUNT rose.

Mr. COX, of New York. Do not disturb me, as I only have five minutes. I say the Committee on Foreign Affairs have allowed interest on large claims against the Government in bills pending.

But, sir, one rule against allowing these stale claims is well grounded in reason. There is a necessity that all litigation should cease. There is the old proverb: There is greater reason in government why time should run against claims where the evidence is liable to be destroyed by the lapse of time. That is the very reason for a statute of limitations; and the only reason why there is no statute of limitations in this case is because there never has been a claim crystallized and fixed against the Government. I think that the statute of limitations could not be better defined by any lawyer, not even by my distinguished friend from Missouri, than it was by Plunkett, the great Irish lawyer, when he said that—

Time is the great destroyer of evidence, but the great protector of titles. With one hand he cuts down the muniments of our possessions, while with the other he measures out those periods of duration which render those muniments no longer necessary.

[Applause.]

It is our duty as individuals to observe such proper limitations, and time stands in states as a plea against these old claims which come down from the remote past. That the title to the Treasury was in the people of this country; it was a part of our possessions. Time may destroy evidence upon which to destroy a portion of these treasures of the people. The periods of duration referred to by Mr. Plunkett render those muniments no longer necessary to protect the resources of the United States which are gathered in our Treasury.

I might read to you in answer to what has fallen from my friend from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD], who has argued this question so well, but I say the result will show that there is no claim on the Treasury. If there were a claim there is no reproach connected with France or the United States for the non-adjustment of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. COX, of New York. There are some clauses in the veto message of President Polk which I would like to append to the remarks I have submitted if there be no objection.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly. They are as follows:

Now, from the provisions of the treaties thus collated the following deductions undeniably follow, namely:

First. Neither the second article of the convention of 1800, as it originally stood, nor the retrenchment of that article, nor the proviso in the ratification by the First Consul, nor the action of the Senate of the United States thereon, was regarded by either France or the United States as the renouncement of any claims of American citizens against France.

Second. On the contrary, in the treaties of 1803, the two governments took up the question precisely where it was left on the day of the signature of that of 1800, without suggestion on the part of France, that the claims of our citizens were excluded by the retrenchment of the second article, or the note of the First Consul, and proceeded to make ample provision for such as France could be induced to admit were justly due, and they were accordingly discharged in full, with interest, by the United States in the stead and behalf of France.

Third. The United States, not having admitted in the convention of 1800 that they were under any obligations to France, by reason of the abrogation of the treaties of 1778 and 1788, persevered in this view of the question by the tenor of the treaties of 1803, and, therefore, had no such national obligation to discharge; and did not, either in purpose or in fact, at any time, undertake to discharge themselves from any such obligation at the expense and with the property of individual citizens of the United States.

Fourth. By the treaties of 1803 the United States obtained from France the acknowledgment and payment, as part of the indemnity for the cession of Louisiana, of claims of citizens of the United States for spoliations, so far as France would admit her liability in the premises; but even then the United States did not relinquish any claim of American citizens not provided for by those treaties; so far from it, to the honor of France be it remembered, she expressly reserved to herself the right to reconsider any rejected claims of citizens of the United States.

Fifth. As to claims of citizens of the United States against France, which had been the subject of controversy between the two countries prior to the signature of the convention of 1800, and the further consideration of which was reserved for a more convenient time by the second article of that convention, for these claims, and these only, provision was made in the treaties of 1803, all other claims being expressly excluded by them from their scope and purview. It is not to be overlooked, though not necessary to the conclusion, that by the convention between France and the United States of the 4th of July, 1831, complete provision was made for the liquidation, discharge, and payment on both sides of all claims of citizens of either against the other for unlawful seizures, captures, sequestrations, or destructions of the vessels, cargoes, or other property, without any limitation of time, so as in terms to run back to the date of the last preceding settlement, at least to that of 1803, if not to the commencement of our national relations with France.

This review of the successive treaties between France and the United States has brought my mind to the undoubting conviction that while the United States have, in the most ample and completest manner, discharged their duty toward such of their citizens as may have been at any time aggrieved by acts of the French Government, so also France has honorably discharged herself of all obligations in the premises toward the United States. To concede what this bill assumes would be to impute undeserved reproach both to France and to the United States.

I am, of course, aware that the bill proposes only to provide indemnification for such valid claims of citizens of the United States against France as shall not have been stipulated for and embraced in any of the treaties enumerated. But in excluding all such claims it excludes all in fact for which, during the negotiations, France could be persuaded to agree that she was in any wise liable to the United States or our citizens. What remains? And for what is five millions appropriated? In view of what has been said, there would seem to be no ground on which to raise a liability of the United States, unless it be the assumption that the United States are to be considered the insurer and the grantor of all claims of whatever nature which any individual citizen may have against a foreign nation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments House bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 4273) for the relief of William R. Calvert; and

A bill (H. R. 7329) granting the right of way to the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad Company across the Fort Robinson military reservation, in the State of Nebraska.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 2530) to authorize an additional appointment on the retired-list of the Army;

A bill (S. 2540) to provide for the expense and compensation of special messengers, to be sent by the Secretary of State to the States respectively of Iowa and Oregon, for the certificates of the electoral votes of 1884, for President and Vice-President of the United States, in pursuance of the provisions of section 141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and Joint resolution to print the letter of the Secretary of State of December 12, 1884, with accompanying reports of United States consuls, on labor in Europe; and the report of Capt. George M. Wheeler, United States Army, of the Third International Geographical Congress and Exhibition at Vienna, with accompanying illustrations.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill (H. R. 7874) making additional appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1820).

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I yield now fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, our experience here leads to the conclusion that where reference of demands against the Government of the character named in the pending bill are made either to a commission or to a judicial tribunal, the probabilities are the demand will be sustained, the act of Congress making such a reference itself indicating to the court or tribunal somewhat the favorable views of Congress in reference to the justice of the demand. The results have almost uniformly been favorable to the demand and to the views of Congress as expressed in the enactment of the law, and Congress has uniformly appropriated the money to carry into effect the report of the tribunal to which the reference was made. So I should hesitate as much to vote for this bill making this reference as I should for an appropriation of money to pay the large sums involved in these claims, aggregating many millions of dollars.

Without intending the least disrespect to any judicial tribunal, I am compelled to believe that the passage of this bill means the payment of these claims. I do not insist that the antiquity of these claims should of itself absolutely exclude them from consideration and absolutely control the action of the House of Representatives, but I do insist that the long period of time which has elapsed since those claims originated, and the refusal of Congress to recognize them at all for nearly half a century, ought to have great weight in deciding this question. It is certainly a strong argument against these claims that nearly half a century had elapsed before any bills at all passed Congress either recognizing their validity or proposing their payment, and that bill was promptly vetoed by the President. I think the argument in favor of the claims—in favor of their validity as against the United States—if I understand it correctly, is based upon the proposition that the Government of the United States in the treaty of 1800 with France yielded away to France, in consideration of the concession by France to the Government of the United States of certain French claims against the United States, claims belonging to citizens of the United States against the French Government, and therefore the Government of the United States ought to pay the citizens of the United States the claims they held against France, in view of the benefits to the United States arising from the concessions made by France. That, I repeat, sir, seems to be the basis of the argument. I submit that if the papers laid before the House are to be trusted, that view of it, although supported by plausible suggestions and arguments, can not in fact be sustained.

I hold in my hand a document published by the authority of the House to which I shall refer. It seems to be conceded that the second article of the treaty of 1800 between France and the United States was stricken out by the Senate of the United States. That second article was as follows:

ART. II. The ministers plenipotentiaries of the two parties not being able to agree at present respecting the treaty of alliance of the 6th February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time; and until they may have agreed upon these points the said treaties and convention shall have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows.

* * * * * * *

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. By Bonaparte I.

Mr. HOLMAN. By the Senate of the United States, as I understand these papers, and in lieu of it the following was adopted by the Senate:

Provided, That the second article be expunged and that the following article be inserted: "It is decreed that the present convention shall be in force for a term of eight years from the time of the exchange of ratifications."

And thus amended the Senate of the United States ratified or proposed to ratify the treaty.

In that form the measure went back to the French Government. That government ratified the treaty, appending, however, to it a note which was designed, as now alleged, to modify the treaty. That notice is in the following words:

The Government of the United States having added in its ratification that the convention should be in force for the space of eight years, and having omitted the second article, the Government of the French Republic consents to accept, ratify, and confirm the above convention, with the addition importing that the convention shall be in force for the space of eight years, and with the retrenchment of the second article: Provided, That by this retrenchment the two states renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article.

Here is the hinge upon which the whole argument seems to turn: "That by this retrenchment (of this second article) the two states renounce the respective pretensions (that is, claims of citizens of respective governments against each government) which are the object of the said article." That is, the respective pretensions of the citizens of each state respectively against the other. That note added by France to the treaty and the effect would naturally suggest just the argument which President Pierce indulged in when he vetoed the bill to pay these claims in 1855. That veto message in its statement and analysis of this question is absolutely exhaustive of the subject.

Mr. BROADHEAD. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana if he is not aware of the fact that Mr. Jefferson submitted that question to the Senate in 1801 and action was taken upon it. It was not regarded as a part of the convention.

Mr. HOLMAN. After so long a lapse of time even history becomes obscure where it is presented from different standpoints. Mr. Pierce presented the following view of that subject:

The convention, as thus ratified by the First Consul, having been again submitted to the Senate of the United States, that body resolved that "they considered the convention as fully ratified," and returned the same to the President for promulgation, and it was accordingly promulgated in the usual form by President Jefferson.

But I will present further on the views of President Pierce as to the effect of that French note.

Now, the question presented is whether that treaty as ratified also embraced the note of the French Emperor. President Pierce's argument is so full and complete upon this subject, and so unanswerable as I think, that I desire to present it to the consideration of the House. He says:

Now, it is clear that in simply resolving that "they considered the convention as fully ratified" the Senate did, in fact, abstain from any express declaration of dissent or assent to the construction put by the First Consul on the retrenchment of the second article.

* * * * * * *

By the second article, as it originally stood, neither republic had relinquished its existing rights or pretensions, either as to other previous treaties or the indemnities mutually due or claimed, but only deferred the consideration of them to a convenient time. By the amendment of the Senate of the United States, that convenient time, instead of being left indefinite, was fixed at eight years; but no right or pretension of either party was surrendered or abandoned.

If the Senate erred in assuming that the proviso added by the First Consul did not affect the question, then the transaction would amount to nothing more than to have raised a new question to be disposed of on resuming the negotiations, namely, the question whether the proviso of the First Consul did or did not modify or impair the effect of the convention, as it had been ratified by the Senate.

That such, and such only, was the true meaning and effect of the transaction; that it was not, and was not intended to be, a relinquishment by the United States of any existing claim on France, and especially that it was not an abandonment of any claims of individual citizens, nor the set-off of these against any conceded national obligations of France is shown by the fact that President Jefferson did at once resume and prosecute to successful conclusion negotiations to obtain from France indemnification for the claims of citizens of the United States existing at the date of that convention; for, on the 30th of April, 1803, three treaties were concluded at Paris between the United States of America and the French Republic, one of which embraced the cession of Louisiana, another stipulated for the payment of sixty millions of francs by the United States to France, and a third provided that for the satisfaction of sums due by France to citizens of the United States at the conclusion of the convention of September 30, 1800, and in express compliance with the second and fifth articles thereof, a further sum of twenty millions of francs should be appropriated and paid by the United States.

Just that and nothing more.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us see whether the treaty of 1803, three years later, does not fully sustain the argument made by the President of the United States in his veto message of 1855. The treaty of 1803 contains, among other articles, the following:

ARTICLE I. The debts due by France to citizens of the United States, contracted before the eighth Vendémiaire, ninth year of the French Republic (30th September, 1800), shall be paid according to the following regulations, with interest at 6 per cent., to commence from the periods when the accounts and vouchers were presented to the French Government.

ART. II. The debts provided for by the preceding article are those whose result is comprised in the conjectural note annexed to the present convention, and which, with the interest, can not exceed the sum of 20,000,000 of francs. The claims comprised in the said note which fall within the exceptions of the following articles shall not be admitted to the benefits of this provision.

* * * * * * *

ART. IV. It is expressly agreed that the preceding articles shall comprehend no debts but such as are due to citizens of the United States who have been and are yet creditors of France for supplies for embargoes and prizes made at sea, in which the appeal has been properly lodged within the time mentioned in the said convention, eighth Vendémiaire, ninth year (30th September, 1800)."

Now, Mr. Speaker, what follows? Under that provision, the 20,000,000 francs were paid by the United States to the creditors named. President Pierce, in that message, says the United States did not abandon the claim of their citizens on France, and adds:

On the contrary, in the treaties of 1803 the two governments took up the question precisely where it was left on the day of the signature of that of 1800, without suggestion on the part of France that the claims of our citizens were excluded by the retrenchment of the second article or the note of the First Consul, and proceeded to make ample provision for such as France could be induced to admit were just, and they were accordingly discharged in full, with interest, by the United States in the stead and behalf of France.

Third. The United States, not having admitted in the convention of 1800 that they were under any obligations to France, by reason of the abrogation of the treaties of 1778 and 1788, persevered in this view of the question by the tenor of the treaties of 1803, and therefore had no such national obligation to discharge, and did not, either in purpose or in fact, at any time undertake to discharge themselves from any such obligation at the expense and with the property of individual citizens of the United States.

Mr. BROADHEAD. Does the gentleman consider the word "debts" as synonymous with claims?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; the terms used seem to compel that conclusion, for the terms used, "for supplies for embargoes and prizes made at sea," in which the appeal has been properly lodged within the time mentioned in the said convention of 1800, show the meaning of the term. I have not read the whole of article 4, and I should be very glad if I had the time to read the whole article, which is a long one, but it excludes claims of citizens of the United States who were in partnership with citizens of England and other specified claims.

Now, how is it possible if the note affixed to the treaty by the French Government is to be regarded as a part of the treaty, or that note is regarded as an interpretation of that treaty—how is it possible that by the first and second articles of this treaty of 1803 a part at least of the very claims are provided for, and to the extent of 20,000,000 francs were paid to our citizens by the United States, which my friend insists the Government of the United States became responsible for because the Government of the United States had obtained a corresponding benefit from France by France waiving her claims against the Government of the United States?

Mr. BROADHEAD. Will the gentleman permit me to read the fifth article?

Mr. HOLMAN. I regret that I have only fifteen minutes. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman if I had time. That article, I think, does not change the case. It is clear the treaty of 1803 is absolutely unintelligible if the claims of American citizens against France were waived by the treaty of 1800. If the views expressed by Mr. Pierce are correct, the treaty of 1800 settled nothing as to claims of American citizens against France and the note of the French consul was never regarded either by France or the United States as a part of the treaty. The exclusion by the fourth article of large claims of American citizens from participating in the distribution of the 20,000,000 francs shows conclusively that either the treaty of 1800 was entirely lost sight of when that of 1803 was made or else that treaty of 1800 does not bear the interpretation which gentlemen have thought proper to impose upon it.

A word further. I have said all I am able to say in the few minutes allowed me on the argument of this case; but let me inquire whether there is not force in this argument of the President of the United States in the veto of 1855:

If new facts, not known or not accessible during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, or Mr. Monroe, had since been brought to light, or new sources of information discovered, this would greatly relieve the subject of embarrassment. But nothing of this nature has occurred.

That these eminent statesmen had the best means of arriving at a correct conclusion no one will deny. That they never recognized the alleged obligations on the part of the Government is shown by the history of their respective administrations. Indeed it stands, not as a matter of controlling authority, but as a fact of history, that these claims have never, since our existence as a nation, been deemed by any President worthy of recommendation to Congress.

Have any new facts been brought to light since that message was delivered? I think President Polk in his message vetoing this measure, in 1846, presents the subject with equal force, when he says:

I can perceive no legal or equitable ground upon which this large appropriation can rest. A portion of the claims have been more than half a century before the Government, in its executive or legislative departments, and all of them had their origin in events which occurred prior to the year 1800. Since 1802 they have been from time to time before Congress. No greater necessity or propriety exists for providing for these claims at this time than has existed for near half a century, during all of which period this questionable measure has never until now received the favorable consideration of Congress.

That was forty-six years after the origin of these claims! President Polk proceeds as follows:

It is scarcely probable, if the claim had been regarded as obligatory upon the Government, or constituting an equitable demand upon the Treasury, that those who were contemporaneous with the events which gave rise to it should not long since have done justice to the claimants. The Treasury has often been in a condition to enable the Government to do so without inconvenience, if these claims had been considered just. Mr. Jefferson, who was fully cognizant of the early dissensions between the Government of the United States and France, out of which the claims arose, in his annual message in 1808—

Only five years after the convention of 1803—

adverted to the large surplus then in the Treasury, and its "probable accumulation," and inquired whether it should "lie unproductive in the public vaults;" and yet these claims, though then before Congress, were not recognized or paid. Since that time the public debt of the Revolution and of the war of 1812 has been extinguished, and at several periods since the Treasury has been in possession of large surpluses over the demands upon it. In 1836 the surplus amounted to many millions of dollars, and for want of proper objects to which to apply it it was directed by Congress to be deposited with the States.

During this extended course of time, embracing periods eminently favorable for satisfying all just demands upon the Government, the claims embraced in this bill met with no favor in Congress beyond reports of committees in one or the other branch. These circumstances alone are calculated to raise strong doubts in respect to these claims; more especially as all the information necessary to a correct judgment concerning them has been long before the public. These doubts are strengthened in my mind by the examination I have been enabled to give the transactions in which they originated.

This argument was made against these claims forty-six years after the treaty of 1800 was made on which this claim is based against the United States, and now after eighty-four years have elapsed and the facts have become more obscure by the lapse of time, these ancient claims are sought to be fastened upon the Treasury through the skillful expedient of a judicial proceeding. The facts of history are against the measure, and the argument addressed to Congress by a President of the United States thirty-eight years ago ought to be potential in averting action on this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT].

Mr. HUNT. I have also ten minutes from the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. We have agreed with the other side not to call the previous question at this time. When the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] shall have occupied twenty minutes I will resume the floor in my own right, and I will yield to my friend from Louisiana after I take the floor in my own right.

Mr. HUNT. I will reserve, then, the three minutes I have received from the gentleman from Wisconsin, and take the thirteen minutes together.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will occupy twenty minutes, and I will then resume the floor.

Mr. BLOUNT. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that the circumstances under which this bill comes before the House precludes that full consideration which the subject ought to receive. It has been a long while since I have gone over the history of these claims as it has been presented from time to time before the Congress of the United States, and I say I regret that the circumstances under which this bill comes before us are such that, like other gentlemen, I have been unable to refresh my memory as to the occurrences connected with the origin of these claims.

It has been urged before the House by gentlemen in favor of this bill that the United States Government, in consideration of being released from the obligations under the treaty of 1778, to guarantee the title of the French to their territory on this continent and the West Indies and the various other provisions of the treaty, had agreed to renounce the claims of private citizens of this country whose property had been destroyed by French vessels. If that was true, if those were the real facts of the case, if it rested simply upon that proposition, it would be, as urged by a distinguished gentleman on this side of the House, a matter that could be stated in a nutshell.

But, sir, I do not so regard it. These claims had been pressed time and again on the part of the United States Government but to no effect. Other claims had been adjusted. The French Government never set up its claim for damages except as a set-off by reason of failure on our part to comply with the treaty of 1778. It never invited the attention of the Government of the United States to the violation of that treaty or asked damages for it. The United States Government had expressly declared that it was not so bound; that even under the terms of that treaty we were simply bound to aid France in her own defense when she was engaged in a purely defensive war, and the action of the Government and the opinion of the times indicate, and the answer to that French claim has always been, that the war in which France was then engaged was not a purely defensive war. Whenever we brought up claims for depredations committed by France on the commerce of our citizens we were met by the diplomats of France with this claim, but under such circumstances only was it ever presented. We were a weak power; we were few in number; there were certain things that we as a nation might safely attempt; there were other things that we as a nation were unable to do or to assert.

I undertake to say that no man at that time would have justified the United States Government in attempting to enforce these claims by any act of aggression. We found ourselves, when we were in negotiation with the French Government, discussing not the subject of our release from the guarantee obligation of treaty of 1778. That was not the subject uppermost in the minds of our negotiators. There were other important articles in the treaty and it was to them that public attention was most directed. I have the treaty before me. In the time at my command I can not examine its provisions in detail, but I will rapidly run over some of the subjects to which it relates: Article III refers to the restoration of captured public ships; Article IV to captured property not definitely condemned to be restored. Other subjects dealt with are form of passports to merchant ships; payment of debts due by individuals of either nation; freedom of commerce; acquirement and disposal of property, &c.

There were various important questions—live questions about which there might be dispute—about which there was necessarily trouble, and those were the questions that were interesting this Government. Incidentally there came up this question about our obligations under the treaty of 1778. The Government of the United States did, it is true, bring forward these spoliation claims, but that was not the important subject of the treaty. Was our weak, feeble nation in its then existing attitude in any condition to renounce the interests of the balance of the people of the United States and to insist upon the payment of this class of claims? I say there is no principle of morals, there is no principle of common sense or justice, upon which this Government could be expected under such circumstances to stand and demand payment of these claims, to the injury and the sacrifice of the interests of the country in regard to many other commercial questions out of which great troubles were likely to arise. When the Government had done what it could for these claimants; when it had negotiated; when negotiation had ceased and had been renewed in their interest; and when it was finally represented to this Government on the part of the American minister that nothing could be done with the proposed treaty unless we ceased to press these claims upon the French Government, then it was and not till then that the acceptance of the proviso of Napoleon Bonaparte was agreed to.

Now it seems to me that these facts do give answer to the question, why did not the public men who then controlled the Government see fit to insist upon the payment of these claims? Why did they not insist that the Government of the United States should pay these claims?

I hold in my hand the only document, so far as I know, illustrating the character of these claims. It comes from the President of the United States. I refer to it for the purpose of showing that the persons interested in these claims are small in number as compared with the population that was then located all over this land and interested in the other provisions of the treaty. I turn casually to page 185 of this document, on which I find the names of about twenty claimants, all of whom are underwriters; I turn to another page and find that the claimants, with one exception, are of the same class. If you take up this document and examine it, you will find that nine out of ten of these claims are the claims of underwriters. These people who were paid for the risks they undertook by the merchants of this country are insisting that the Government of the United States shall take the consequences of a failure to negotiate a great treaty of this kind in order that their claims might be effectually asserted.

These are the gentlemen behind this measure who have been agitating it from the beginning, and I suppose the men who lived in the days to which I have referred and exercised then the functions of government understood well who these claimants were—better than we do now; and that in this rests a part of the reasons for their refusal to provide for payment. These men were doubtless paid for all the risks that they undertook by the merchants.

Gentlemen here continually talk about American merchants who are put forward as the people who were conducting our commerce and whose interests were destroyed; and this is done with the view of persuading this House that these claimants are in general a class entitled to consideration, rather than a lot of underwriters who have been once fully and amply paid by the men who conducted American commerce at that time.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE], when I read to-day from this document furnished by the President of the United States as containing information from the highest source, did not deny my assertion as to the general character of these claims, but stated that a number of gentlemen interested had written to him and that these gentlemen did not belong to corporations. I do not know to what class those gentlemen belong. It may be that they belong to the merchant class. If those claims are claims which originated in the losses of merchants, then that class of men did not follow the general policy of insuring which we have found to obtain elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker, the statement which has been made on this point is important in another point of view. President Polk, in his veto message, estimated these claims as amounting at the time of his veto to $5,000,000. Now they are estimated by this administration, as I am informed by the honorable gentleman from Wisconsin and others who have examined the matter, to amount without interest to $12,000,000; so that since Mr. Polk vetoed the bill for the payment of these claims the amount has increased, on the part largely of these underwriters, from $5,000,000 to $12,000,000. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] has stated that quite a number of these claims—I believe his language was "hundreds"—are unreported; and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] came to my desk and said that he represented citizens who he thought had hundreds of these claims.

Mr. MILLIKEN. You put it too high. I did not say "hundreds."

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend may make his statement again. I understood him to say hundreds.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I did not name any number. I said that there were claims that were not reported. And I desire to say now, inasmuch as the gentleman has called me out——

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield except for a correction.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Well, I claim that the gentleman has no right to call my name out in the House and then refuse me a chance to reply.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am entitled to the floor; and I insist that the gentleman has no right under any such sophism as that to take me off the floor.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman should not undertake to quote me unless he allows an answer.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman can not dictate to me. When he has made an announcement, I think I have a right to criticise it as a member of the House.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And when the gentleman states my remarks erroneously I have a right to correct him.

Mr. BLOUNT. But the gentleman wanted to go further and make remarks. I do not insist that the gentleman shall not correct me. But my recollection of the conversation was that the gentleman at first said there were cases in his district, and when I asked him how many, I understood him to say a great many; perhaps hundreds.

Mr. MILLIKEN. You made a mistake; you did not hear correctly; that is all.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, it matters not. There are two gentlemen at all events whose constituents have such claims. They are coming from every quarter. They are held by myriads of people, but they are all to go before this court, and all on ex parte showing as to their character.

Mr. MILLIKEN. There is nothing ex parte about it.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman says there is nothing ex parte about it. I would like to know how he would be able to go in and take care of the Government under the circumstances proposed by this bill any better than we are able to take care of it in the matter of claims pending before this House.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The bill itself provides for that.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, there is a difference of opinion upon that subject, and I do not wish to be interrupted. Our own experience teaches us how much reliance is to be placed in the argument that we shall be able to guard the interests of the United States in investigations of that character.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Read the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say to the gentleman that I have carefully read the bill, and I am not able to observe that there is any better feature in it which protects the Government than is to be found in investigations in this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has twenty minutes.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Louisiana for thirteen minutes, three minutes having been yielded to him by another gentleman.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. Speaker, assuming the knowledge upon this subject which faithful readers of American history have, it suffices for me to say that there was between France and the United States a treaty of alliance, a treaty of commerce, and a convention known as the convention of November, 1778.

In the stormy period of the French revolution the commerce of the United States was swept from the seas, in violation of our conventional rights, secured by the treaty with France.

When the plenipotentiaries of the United States resorted to Paris for the purpose of negotiating in reference to the spoliations thus committed upom American citizens they were unable to agree with the French plenipotentiaries, and it is so stated in the following language of the second article of the treaty of 1800:

The parties will negotiate further on these subjects—

The indemnities mutually claimed by the two countries—

at a convenient time, and until they may have agreed upon the points the said treaties and convention shall have no operation, and the relation of the two countries shall be regulated as follows, &c.

This convention was returned to the United States, and the Senate amended it to the effect "that it is agreed that the provision should be in force for the term of eight years." So stood the matter when it was brought to the attention of the First Consul, who was willing to ratify the convention as amended by the Senate of the United States:

Provided, That by this retrenchment the two states renounce their respective pretensions which are the objects of the said article.

The amendment of the First Consul was accepted by the Senate, and the treaty as amended was promulgated and became the law of the land.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana a question.

Mr. HUNT. I must beg my friend to excuse me, as I have but a very brief time.

The Constitution of the United States provides, article 5 of the amendments to the Constitution, that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. Now, the citizens of the United States had these claims for spoliations committed upon the commerce of the United States by French vessels. They had property in the claims.

Property implies exclusive dominion. It can be given inter vivos. It can be bequeathed mortis causa. It may be transferred by deed or otherwise. It may be corporeal or tangible, or incorporeal and intangible as a claim. The richest property is frequently in claims. The richest hopes that are bequeathed are often those which are vested in claims, and the property in claims was that kind of property which was the subject of consideration and of final settlement by the convention between the high contracting parties; and it is property like this which, as well as other kinds of property, under the Constitution of the United States can not be taken except for just compensation.

Gentlemen here have dwelt upon the claims of France against the United States as of no account in this controversy. That great government deliberated upon them, not by the Emperor, as the gentleman from Indiana has erroneously called him, but by the First Consul, who took his stand upon them. They must be, he held, taken into consideration in the agreement about to be concluded, or he would not go into the convention at all.

The First Consul considered them as good claims and was willing to negotiate upon them, and provided they were received as a quid pro quo by the United States. Our plenipotentiaries could not treat except by way of mutual concessions of the claims of both governments. Now, what were our claims against France? They were for our commerce spoliated upon every sea. These were claims for damages inflicted upon a gainful, prosperous people, and whom unjust spoliation finally impoverished. By executing the treaty with France the Government of the United States gave up the claims. As against France they no longer existed; but they survived evidently in favor of the citizens interested against their own Government, which had parted with them for a valuable consideration.

Now, sir, it is only left for me to comment briefly upon the sentimental reading which the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has given us from Plunkett upon the doctrine of limitations. That gentleman tells of the beauties of this doctrine—the repose which comes from the oblivion which gathers about old claims. But he has forgotten altogether to tell us of the reason for the doctrine, and the application of it to the matter in hand.

Who ever heard of the doctrine of limitations being applied to parties always in court? Who ever heard that the doctrine could be applied to parties who like those here involved for one hundred years have been knocking at the gates of the Capitol. Who ever heard that the statute of limitations or law of prescription could have any such application?

Mr. Speaker, says Senator Sumner, a learned international jurist, who reflected honor upon his great State by his proficiency in that branch of law:

Memorials and petitions from the beginning testify to the sleeplessness of these claims. On the 5th of February, 1802, only forty-six days after the promulgation of the convention of 1800, they began, and they have continued from that early day down to this very session of Congress, making in all 3,293. Of these, 1,489 were in the Senate, 1,804 in the House. They are chiefly from original sufferers, their executors, administrators, assigns, widows, and heirs, residing in the large seaports from which the despoiled vessels originally sailed; but there are some from all parts of the country, where, in the vicissitudes of life, the representatives of original sufferers have been carried—all of which may be seen in a list of these petitioners.

Who does not know that unliquidated claims are hardly ever transferred from the nature of the case, because the transferee does not know the price he ought to pay? Who does not know, and none better than the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], that if an underwriter pays a claim he is subrogated of right and ought to be to the claim? The truth is, this bill only gives to these people a persona standi in judicio; only a right to come into the courts of the country and promote their suits; only a right to say to the judges: We have had these claims pending before the country for a hundred years; allow us now to make due proof of them.

National honor is made up of an aggregation of individual consciences. The same sentiment that ought to lead the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and does lead him to be prompt in the payment of his debts, to refuse gratuities at the hands of others and to keep his promises, must apply a fortiori in the instant case to a country so great, so powerful, so wealthy as our country is.

And this brings me to the last remark I have time to make. I am sorry that a statesman, for the gentleman from Indiana holds that position, has been willing to say here that the Louisiana convention of 1803 provided for the payment of these claims. Says Senator Sumner:

The objection that these claims were provided for in the convention of 1803, for the purchase of Louisiana, is equally untenable. It is difficult to understand how such an objection was ever made; but the history of this question shows the strange shifts of opposition, especially when without any restraint from a knowledge of the subject.

I commend that language to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, and also the language with which the report of Senator Sumner, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate of the United States, concludes, in which he says that Mr. Livingston, then in Paris, and than whom nobody was perhaps more fully able to decide properly, had declared it to be beyond doubt, I might say luce clarior, that the convention of 1803 included no provision whatever for the claims under consideration; that the claims included in the convention of 1803 and known as the Louisiana compact were dehors the treaty of 1800.

And has it come to this, that claims of the magnitude of those provided for in the bill before the House concerning persons so deserving, and touching the national sentiment connected with our public history as a people, intimately interwoven with the administration of Washington, consecrated by the approval of Madison, depending on the construction of a strong, great, and powerful international compact, the other party to which was the First Consul of France—has it come to this, I ask, that such claims are to be dismissed on assertions which are trampled under foot on the best authority? Are we to be governed in a matter so high and important by the sentimental excursion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and his loose quotation from Mr. Plunkett on the doctrine of limitations, entirely inapplicable to the condition of the parties in interest? [Applause.]

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS].

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 729) for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, Mr. PIKE, and Mr. BROWN to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

Mr. PHELPS. This is certainly a piece of ancient history, but none the worse for its age, if it be a true piece. We are now at the end of the nineteenth century providing for the debts of the eighteenth. If they are just this delay is the strongest reason for our action; and that they are just I honestly believe, and to that conclusion public opinion has at last settled. Fortunately the origin of these claims is so simple that the obscurity of the past can not becloud it.

In our Revolutionary war we very generously but very foolishly guaranteed to France the security of her West Indian power. When the war grew fierce between France and England we of course did not make good our guarantee. We could not; so we were not to blame for this.

But we went further; we said we would not, and in official document we declared that our status should be one of absolute neutrality between the two contesting powers. For this we were to blame, and the French marine, hostile before to the English-speaking sailors who came from Great Britain, grew hostile to the English-speaking sailors from America. In their fury they set out on a career of destruction against every craft that was manned by Anglo-Saxon men. They destroyed many merchant vessels. The owners of these are the claimants in this case. Their government promptly demanded redress of the French Republic. We talked of $20,000,000. We were met by a counter-claim of two hundred and eighty millions damage which the French Republic had suffered because we had broken our treaty of guarantee.

Twenty millions against two hundred and eighty millions! The gentleman from Wisconsin would have hesitated. Not so our commissioners. They jumped at the bargain, and were too happy to call it quits. And their treaty was ratified more quickly than will be any of those now pending in the Senate.

By this convention the United States became the debtor in place of France to all who suffered from French spoliation. Nor did these claimants sleep on their claims. They followed down the centuries—I beg pardon, the century, although they may need to follow down the centuries. They followed the different Congresses down the century, and got what? Forty reports, of which thirty-eight were favorable and the other two decidedly unfavorable. They got committed in the reports which they prepared the greatest lawyers of the age—Webster, Clayton, Choate, Everett, Sumner, Cushing, each preparing one or more reports indorsing the legality of the case. Their minds were too robust to find in the ingenious but minute objection of my young friend from Wisconsin any obstacle to bar.

But these waking claimants got no money. It is time now that they did; and our committee to-day are taking a first step, not a long one, in the direction of giving them some. We are sending their claims to the Court of Claims, that they may there be judicially examined and judicially stated. And when they come out in legal shape I hope, and I hope that the House wishes, that the moral claim which they will have to payment may be promptly recognized. There are but two substantial objections. They tell us the claims are stale and assigned. Mr. Speaker, will there ever be a private claim against this Government which will not be so delayed as to be stale? Will there ever be a number of citizens, owning claims, who will not in this delay be forced by their necessities to sell their rights? But delay when the Government only is at fault and assignment are no bars to legal claimants. And these claims have the rights of law, not the charities of equity.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, this bill, the first step toward paying these old debts, may pass. It must if there is much chance that these claims of the eighteenth century shall be paid in the nineteenth, and not have to wait for the twentieth.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN].

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not propose, in the course of one minute, to discuss the merits of this question. I desire simply to call the attention of the House to the character of the bill which is before us, and upon which we are to pass.

This, I think, is the last claim growing out of the struggle of this country for its independence. These claimants have been knocking at the doors of Congress for a period of eighty years. This bill, it is true, does not provide that these claims shall be paid; it does not settle the merits of the question at all; it simply provides that these claimants who have been so long seeking redress shall have an opportunity to go into court and have their claims investigated and have the result of that investigation reported to Congress, leaving Congress entirely free to act in the matter as it shall deem best. Shall these claimants have an opportunity to go into court and establish their claims if they have any? Shall they have an opportunity to go into court and have their claims adjudicated so far as it can be done, leaving the court to give to Congress the information which it obtains in the course of that adjudication? That is the only question before this House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move that this bill be referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act, if that motion be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I move to commit the bill to the Committee on Claims without instructions.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 181, nays 71, not voting 71; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 7964) to provide for the expenses and compensation of special messengers to be sent by the Secretary of State to the States respectively of Iowa and Oregon for the certificates of the electoral vote of 1884 for President and Vice-President of the United States in pursuance of the provisions of section 141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

CHINESE INDEMNITY FUND.

Mr. WAIT. On behalf of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I call up for consideration at the present time the bill (H. R. 1004) relative to the Chinese indemnity fund. The bill has been reported from the committee with amendments.

The SPEAKER. The bill referred to by the gentleman is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Does the gentleman move to go into Committee of the Whole or ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill?

Mr. WAIT. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from its further consideration and that the House now proceed to its consideration.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the residue of the indemnity received from China, which is now in the custody of the Secretary of State, and is known and designated in the accounts and reports of the Department of State as the Chinese indemnity fund, to be returned to the Chinese Government.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs were read, as follows:

At the end of the bill strike out the words "returned to the Chinese Government" and insert "converted into coin, and the sum of $583,400.90 be returned to the Chinese Government, and the balance of said fund, if any, be covered into the Treasury of the United States."

Add the following proviso:

"Provided, That before the payment to China, the Secretary of State shall pay from said fund to the executors of Charles E. Hill the sum of $130,000, upon receipt of a release in full for all claims upon China for the use and loss of the steamer Kenjeor, in or about the year 1863.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House no longer than is necessary to state the reasons which the Committee on Foreign Affairs believe call for the prompt passage of this bill and the pending amendments.

The bill now under consideration provides for the return, to the Government of China, of certain funds, now in the hands of the Secretary of State, known as the "Chinese indemnity fund."

In order that the House may fully understand the reasons which influenced the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report the bill with a favorable recommendation, I will, as briefly as possible, review the circumstances under which this money came into the custody of the United States. Under the privileges granted by the treaty of 1844, between the United States and China, known as the "Treaty of Wanghia," a large number of American citizens took up their residences in China, and engaged in various pursuits.

The opening of the Empire to foreigners, under the provisions of the various treaties with foreign countries, created a very hostile feeling among a large class of the Chinese people.

Between the years 1844 and 1858 numerous losses were sustained by American residents of China by reason of the destruction of their property through the acts of lawless bands of Chinese; the greatest number and the heaviest losses occurring after the year 1850, when the powerful revolt known as the Taeping rebellion broke out, which continued to render the power of the central government nugatory in a large section of the country for a number of years.

In 1858 these losses were scheduled by the United States minister in China, and a demand was made by him upon the Chinese Government for their payment. After some delay, and a reduction of the amount demanded to 500,000 taels ($735,258.97), a treaty was concluded between the two governments providing for the payment of this sum from the customs receipts at the three principal open ports of the Chinese Empire.

Under the provisions of an act of Congress two commissioners, Messrs. Charles W. Bradley, United States consul at Ningpo, and O. E. Roberts, United States vice-consul at Hong-Kong, were appointed to adjust the claims and award such sums as might be found to be justly due; their decisions to be final.

The commissioners appointed were both at the time residents of China, and familiar with all the circumstances under which the claims arose.

They met at Macao, in China, November 18, 1859, and concluded their labors on the 13th day of January, 1860.

Upon examination all the claims were found to be more or less exaggerated, and some to be entirely groundless; while others were presented by persons not citizens of the United States.

After paying all the claims to the apparent satisfaction of the claimants—no protest being filed in any case—with interest for five years at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, there remained a surplus of more than one-third of the gross sum received from China.

As the money was paid upon the representations of the United States Government that it was required to cover losses arising from the destruction of private property of Americans resident in China which occurred prior to 1858, and as the terms of the treaty expressly specified that it was to be applied to that purpose, it followed as a matter of right and justice that the surplus should have been returned to China as soon as its amount had been ascertained. This course was recommended by President Buchanan, and has been repeatedly urged by every succeeding Executive, including President Arthur, yet no conclusive action has been taken by Congress to carry these recommendations into effect.

In consequence of this inaction on the part of Congress, the Secretary of State was constrained to direct the money to be sent to the United States for safe-keeping, and it was deposited in the vaults of the State Department.

In the exigency of the stringent money market during the civil war the money was used by the United States Government, and bonds of the Government were deposited with the Secretary of State to represent it.

The facts, as here outlined, clearly show that this "fund," which is still in the custody of the Secretary of State in the form of United States bonds, should be returned to the Chinese Government without further delay.

The fund having always been regarded and treated as the property of China—as it manifestly is—any increase in the nature of earnings which may have accrued during the pendency of its return attaches to the principal under the clearest construction of law and the simplest rules of justice and equity.

The question presented by the bill (H. R. 3766) is the claim of the owners and insurers of the bark Caldera, pillaged and destroyed by Chinese pirates in October, 1854, to five years' interest, at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum on the 60 per cent. of their original claim, which was disallowed by the board of commissioners in making their awards, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from January 26, 1860, to date.

After a careful review of all the evidence in this case the committee find, from the protest of the master of the Caldera, filed with the French consul at Hong-Kong immediately after the occurrence, and from other conclusive testimony, that the bark encountered a severe typhoon on her first day out from Hong-Kong bound for San Francisco with a cargo of tea; that the sails were "torn into shreds" and the vessel was so severely strained by the force of the gale and the heavy sea that she leaked very badly, necessitating the constant working of the pumps to keep her free; that after driving before the gale for two days she grounded while endeavoring to take shelter in a bay on the coast of the Five Islands, suffering considerable damage to her hull. After working off the bar upon which she had struck she anchored in the bay, the men being kept continually at work at the pumps to keep the water in the hold from gaining upon them; that while thus engaged the crew were surprised and overpowered by Chinese pirates and the cargo plundered; that at that time there was four feet of water in the hold, immersing about one-third of the cargo; that the vessel proved a total loss, and a large part of the cargo was carried away by the pirates; that upon being informed of this outrage the Chinese Government sent several war junks, in conjunction with war vessels of foreign powers, and dispersed the pirates, recovering a small portion of the stolen property. That both the hull of the vessel and her cargo had been seriously damaged by the elements and her rigging almost totally destroyed before she entered the harbor where the robbery was committed is placed beyond all question by the testimony of the master of the Caldera and others.

In considering this case the board of commissioners in China had recourse to the aid of experts, who testified as to the amount of damage sustained previous to the piratical attack, and reached the conclusion that it was 60 per cent. of the first cost, and they therefore allowed 40 per cent. of the claims, with five years' interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, making a sum equal to two-thirds of the gross amount of the claim without interest.

As the rate of interest which prevailed in China at that time was 5 per cent., that rate should have controlled the commissioners in making their awards. By disregarding this rule, which governs all judicial tribunals, they actually gave to the claimants about 50 per cent. of their claims, with the lawful rate of 5 per cent. interest per annum for the five years contemplated in the awards, leaving but about 50 per cent. unpaid.

Under authority of an act of Congress approved June 19, 1878, the United States Court of Claims reviewed the Caldera claims and awarded to the claimants the disallowed 60 per cent., with interest thereon at 5 per cent. per annum from January 26, 1860, to the date of the findings of the court, amounting to $113,077.11, and that award was paid by the Secretary of State.

As the total amount of these claims, presented and scheduled by the United States minister in China, was but $90,009.60, they have been paid to date a sum about equal to the full amount of their entire claim, with 5 per cent. interest from the date of the loss to the date of the final payment made by the Secretary of State. This makes no deduction whatever for the damage previously done to the vessel by the elements, which, from the testimony adduced before the board of commissioners, was about 15 per cent. of her first cost, nor for the value of the portion of the cargo recovered, amounting to several thousand dollars.

The sum awarded by China was, in gross, to cover an entire list of claims; and the Court of Claims was right in finding for 60 per cent. of the claim with simple interest, instead of 60 per cent. with the interest prior to the payment of the fund compounded.

In view of all these facts the committee are of the opinion that these claimants have been paid every dollar to which they can possibly lay claim, and more than the merits of the case seem to have demanded.

To summarize: The United States Government, in making a statement of account against China, overcharged that government nearly 100 per cent. through inadvertence. This excess, with its earnings while withheld from China, should be returned forthwith.

The Caldera claimants have received their utmost equitable demands.

The sum received from China under the provisions of the treaty was $735,238.97. After paying all the claims there remained $239,165.77 in gold, which, when transferred to the United States and deposited in the State Department, yielded the sum of $390,223.72. This fund has been invested in United States securities, and at this time, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum added, amounts to $583,400.90, after having paid from it the Caldera claims, awarded by the Court of Claims.

The Secretary of State, writing to the chairman of the subcommittee under date of March 18, 1884, in answer to an inquiry, says: "The Department of State knows of no just claim against this fund."

The excess having been in reality the property of China from the day of its payment into the hands of the United States by every rule of justice, whatever it may have earned while in the custody of the Government of the United States is also the property of China by the strictest construction of law.

The committee therefore report the bill (H. R. 3766) adversely, and recommend that it lie upon the table; and the bill (H. R. 1004) favorably, with an amendment, and recommend its passage.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would like to know whether this claim for $130,000 which it is proposed to deduct has ever been adjudicated?

Mr. WAIT. It has been adjudicated in this way: This claim, the justice of which has been contended for by the representatives of the United States at the court of China and by the several Secretaries of State, has been virtually admitted by China to be just, and some of her prominent officials have said that when this fund was returned the amount of that claim with interest such as Congress should allow should be deducted.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is satisfactory.

Mr. WAIT. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have, after consideration of the whole matter, allowed on the loss of the steamer seized, &c., 5 per cent. interest from that time to the present. In round numbers it is $130,000, which we propose Congress should deduct from the sum to be returned to China.

I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WELLER demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. WAIT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SPECIAL MESSENGER TO GET ELECTORAL VOTE.

On motion of Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. 7964) to provide for the expense and compensation of special messengers to be sent by the Secretary of State to the States respectively of Iowa and Oregon for the certificates of the electoral vote of 1884 for President and Vice-President of the United States, in pursuance of the provisions of section 141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, returned from the Senate with an amendment, was taken from the Speaker's table and the amendment read, as follows:

In line 9, strike out "November" and insert "December."

Mr. RANDALL. The bill as introduced by me this morning was an exact transcript of the draught furnished by the Secretary of State. However, I think the Senate amendment is correct, and will move that it be concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. 7874) making additional appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, with amendments of the Senate, was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed with Senate amendments.

PUBLIC BUILDING, TERRE HAUTE, IND.

Mr. LAMB, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7967) to change the limit of the appropriation for the public building at Terre Haute, Ind.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HITT. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to move to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 343 and ask its immediate consideration.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 77, noes 78.

Mr. WELLER. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us take the vote by tellers.

Mr. HITT. I will not ask consideration of this bill to-night, but only that it be brought before the House and remain as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the mere fact of bringing it before the House to-night would not give it any priority over other business. If the consideration of the bill should not be concluded to-day it would not come up as unfinished business, the day alone being set apart for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HITT. The committee have unanimously instructed me to ask the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the demand of the gentleman from Iowa for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. STORM. I ask for tellers on the motion.

Tellers were ordered, 45 members voting in favor thereof.

AMENDMENT TO THE M'PHERSON BILL.

Mr. BRUMM. Pending the vote by tellers, I ask unanimous consent of the House to introduce and have printed in the RECORD a proposed substitute for the McPherson bill.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know, consent being given for the introduction and reference of that bill proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if it cuts off on to-morrow the presentation of a substitute for the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes simply to have printed in the RECORD a proposed amendment to the bill. It is not yet a pending amendment.

There being no objection, the proposed amendment of Mr. BRUMM was ordered to be printed.

It is as follows:

Substitute for a bill to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, SECTION 1. Strike out all of section 5224 of the Revised Statutes of the United States after the word "business," in the third line, and insert the following: "Or retire its circulation, or any part thereof has been made, the bonds deposited by the association to secure payment of its notes shall be reassigned to it in the manner prescribed by section 5162. And thereafter the association and its shareholders shall stand discharged from all liabilities upon the circulating notes, and those notes shall be redeemed and canceled at the Treasury of the United States. And if any such bank shall fail to make the deposit and take up its bonds for thirty days after the expiration of the time specified, the Comptroller of the Currency shall cancel the bonds pledged for the circulation of said bank, and after providing for the redemption and cancellation of said circulation pay over any balance remaining to the bank or its legal representative."

SEC. 2. That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, shall, upon the expiration of its charter, return to the Treasurer of the United States its circulating notes, or make a sufficient deposit of lawful money to redeem its outstanding circulation, whereupon the bonds deposited by the association to secure payment of its notes shall be reassigned to it in the manner prescribed by section 5162; and thereafter the association and its shareholders shall stand discharged from all liabilities upon the circulating notes, and said notes shall be redeemed and canceled at the Treasury of the United States. And if any such association shall fail to make the deposit and take up its bonds for three years after the expiration of its charter, the Comptroller of the Currency shall cancel the bonds pledged for the circulation of said association; and after providing for the redemption and cancellation of said circulation he shall pay over any balance remaining to the association or its legal representatives.

SEC. 3. That from and after the passage of this act the Treasurer shall not be permitted to issue or sell any United States bonds.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be printed and engraved notes of the United States, in addition to those heretofore authorized, and of the same kind and character as those now in circulation, in denominations of one, two, five, ten, twenty, fifty, and one hundred dollars, to an amount not exceeding the aggregate national-bank-note circulation.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to substitute and pay out the notes hereby authorized, in lieu of the national-bank notes now outstanding and in circulation, as soon as said bank notes are redeemed.

SEC. 6. That for the purpose of carrying into effect the objects of this act the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and proper. And all acts and parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The House having ordered tellers, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HITT.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 104, noes 43.

So the motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) adjourned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks leave to present the views of the minority on the bill just reported from the Committee on Claims. If there be no objection the views of the minority will be received and printed in connection with the report of the committee.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5452) for the relief of John W. Martin, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1266) for the relief of Alexander D. Schenck, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2387) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa, reported it with an amendment.

TESTS OF IRON AND STEEL.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution to print the annual report of tests of iron and steel and other materials for industrial purposes, by Maj. F. H. Parker, United States Army, instruct me to report it favorably and without amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of tests of iron and steel and other materials for industrial purposes, by Maj. F. H. Parker, commanding the Watertown arsenal, transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of War on the 3d of December, 1884, be printed, and that 3,500 additional copies be printed, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House, and 500 copies for the use of the War Department.

STATEMENTS BEFORE SELECT COMMITTEE ON ORDNANCE.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships instruct me to ask authority to print certain statements and papers which will accompany their report for the use of the committee. I therefore offer the following resolution and beg its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to print for the use of the Select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships, and under the direction thereof, the statements and tables prepared to accompany the report of said committee.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 2545) allowing the widow of William H. Hunt, late minister to Russia, one year's salary; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2546) granting a pension to Charlotte C. B. Hatch; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of California, introduced a bill (S. 2547) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Frances L. Thomas, widow of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I wish to respectfully call the attention of the Committee on Pensions to the bill. The widow of this officer, who was one of the great commanders in our late war, is now receiving a pension of $30 a month, which is totally inadequate to her necessities. The bill I introduce proposes to increase it to the same amount that the widow of Admiral Farragut receives, $2,000 a year. That I believe to be just, and I am sure it will meet the approbation of everybody in the country. I ask the Committee on Pensions to be good enough to consider the bill as soon as possible. I move its reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD introduced a bill (S. 2548) to amend section 1000 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That Adolph Feininger have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made upon his claim.

FORT BRADY MILITARY RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. CONGER. Before we go to the Calendar I desire to ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 1374, Order of Business 982, for present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan has the right at this time to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of any bill on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. Then I make the motion to take up the bill indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1374) to provide for the sale of the old site of Fort Brady, Michigan, and for a new site, and the construction of suitable buildings thereon. The question is on agreeing to the motion that the bill be now considered.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. MAXEY. In order to save time I will state that the Committee on Military Affairs report a substitute for the bill which is being read, which fills the blank, and which is somewhat different. It will save time to simply read the substitute reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the text of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendment recommended by the committee be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment reported from the committee will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to sell the military reservation known as Fort Brady, in the village of Sault Sainte Marie, in the State of Michigan, except that portion lying north of Water street extended, which shall be reserved for canal and wharf purposes, and except the plat of ground now occupied as a military cemetery, which shall also be reserved. In disposing of said property the Secretary of War shall cause the grounds to be platted in blocks, streets, and alleys, corresponding as near as may be with the plat of the village of Sault Sainte Marie, and in lots not exceeding one-quarter of an acre in each, unless with due reference to the requirements of the houses and buildings now located on said grounds. The Secretary of War shall also cause the lots to be appraised and sold at public or private sale, at not less than the appraised value, having first been offered at public sale. The expense of advertising, appraisement, survey, and sale shall be paid out of the proceeds of said sale, and the balance paid into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is also authorized to purchase suitable grounds in or near the village of Sault Sainte Marie, and construct thereon necessary buildings, with appurtenances, sufficient for a four-company military post, to be known as Fort Brady, in accordance with estimates to be prepared by the War Department; and a sufficient sum of money, not exceeding $120,000, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of War to comply with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That in platting these grounds the Secretary of War, in his discretion, may reserve all that part of the reservation lying south of Portage street, to be set apart and kept by the municipal authorities of Sault Sainte Marie as a public park for its citizens and the people of the United States.

SEC. 4. That section 1 of this act shall be of effect when the purchase of a new site provided for in section 2 shall have been effected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask as a parliamentary question whether, now that the substitute proposed by the committee has been passed, it will be necessary to postpone indefinitely the original bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The original bill is already disposed of by the substitute being agreed to.

INVITATIONS TO INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITIONS.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move to take up the bill (S. 2436) to enable the President to accept invitations of foreign governments to international exhibitions and to appoint commissioners thereto, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from California.

Mr. HOAR. Has the Calendar been laid before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been.

Mr. HOAR. I want very much to dispose of a matter pending on the Calendar which has been heretofore debated and discussed.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It will take but a few minutes to dispose of this bill. The Committee on Foreign Relations have directed me to ask the Senate to take up the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to both Senators that the question before the Senate is not debatable, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. I so understand, but I suppose the usages of the Senate permit the inquiry for an explanation when a bill is asked to be taken up, as to what the desire of the Senator is, and his expectation about the length of time which it will take. I understand that debate on such a motion must proceed by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that whenever the Government of the United States receives official intimation from any foreign government that it is proposed to hold an international exhibition whereat the representation of the United States is invited, the President may, in his discretion, accept such invitation, and appoint honorary commissioners, without salary, to represent the United States at such exhibition. In order to defray the reasonable and necessary expenses of such commissions and such exhibit as the President may authorize to be made, the bill appropriates $25,000, or so much thereof as may be required, to be immediately available, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. SEWELL. I now offer the amendment which I heretofore proposed to the bill, and which is in print.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the title and insert:

Whereas the Government of the United States has received official intimation from that of Belgium that it is proposed to hold an international exhibition, which will embrace all industrial products, all goods forming objects of commercial transactions, and all objects and appliances of interest to navigation, to be opened at Antwerp, May 2, 1885, and will have a duration of at least five months, whereat the representation of the United States is invited; and

Whereas also, by its action as a government and by the active enterprise of merchants, the United States has attained and holds a prominent place in all that relates to the development of all industrial products, the extension of the great commercial relationship with other countries, based on the exportation of goods forming objects of commercial transactions, which now form an important factor in the national wealth, and it is expedient that the industries and interests thus concerned should be adequately represented on the occasion: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the invitation of the Belgium Government be accepted; and that, under the auspices of the Department of State, the United States commissioners to the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition at New Orleans be, and they hereby are, instructed to prepare or cause to be prepared, upon the termination of said World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition, a complete and systematic representative exhibition of the Government exhibits at the exposition at New Orleans, and to take such further measures as may be necessary in order to secure a proper representation of the productions of our industry and of the nature of the natural resources of the country at the international exhibition to be held at Antwerp in 1885.

SEC. 2. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint three commissioners to represent the United States in the proposed exhibition at Antwerp, and, under the general direction of the Secretary of State, to make all needful rules and regulations in reference to the exhibits and contributions from this country, and to control the expenditures incident to the proper installation and exhibition thereof, and to the preparation of reports on the exposition.

SEC. 3. That the President be authorized, in his discretion, to assign one or more public vessels to transport to and from Antwerp, free of cost, under regulations to be prescribed by the commissioners to the Antwerp exposition, such articles of the Government exhibit as may be selected and prepared for transportation by the commissioners to the New Orleans exposition, and such other articles as may be offered for exhibition by the citizens of the United States.

SEC. 4. That in order to defray the necessary expenses above authorized, and for the proper installation of the exhibition, and the expenditures of the commissioners, made under the direction of the Secretary of State and with his approval, and not otherwise, there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose herein specified, which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. MILLER, of California. There are quite a number of invitations from various governments that come in from time to time, requesting the United States to participate in international exhibitions. The first one about to occur, I think, is that in May or June at Antwerp. There is also to be an inventions exhibition in London this year, opening in May, and there have been other invitations extended. The committee thought that a general bill giving the President of the United States the authority to accept these invitations and have this Government properly represented would be the best course to pursue. The Senator from New Jersey and some other Senators think that such a bill as that goes a little too far, and he has offered a substitute, which relates solely to the exhibition at Antwerp.

I am not tenacious about the bill. Of course the Government ought to be represented at Antwerp. We have been invited by Belgium and urged to participate in that exhibition. A place has been kept open for the United States. The Belgian Government is very anxious that this nation shall be represented there; so there is a reason for the substitute; and there are reasons for passing such a measure even if the general bill should not be passed, but if the general bill should be passed it would provide for all cases, the London exhibition of inventions and all other international exhibitions. However, it would apply to none but those held under the auspices of some government. There is to be an exhibition in London next year which seems to be a private one. The general bill which I ask to have considered this morning would not include that exhibition. It is for the Senate to decide which of these courses it will pursue; but something ought to be done in reference to the subject immediately.

Mr. SEWELL. The only great international exhibition undisposed of at present, so far as we are concerned, I believe is the one at Antwerp, under the auspices of the Belgian Government. That exposition opens in May. It is extremely desirable that we should be represented there. Our merchants and manufacturers can there find one of the best and most central outlets in Europe for our products. Antwerp is the best located outlet with a view to railroad and water transportation that there is in Europe. The Belgian Government is very anxious that we should be represented there.

King Leopold of Belgium takes a great interest in the manufacturing interests of his own country. There is no other such level-headed, industrious business man in Europe as he is, occupying a similar position. He has even gone so far as to suggest to gentlemen interested that he would keep the American allotment boarded up until July, until the exhibits could be removed from New Orleans, and also that we could ship them from there direct to Antwerp. Belgium was represented at our great Centennial Exhibition, and is now represented by quite an exhibit at New Orleans.

I should not have any objection to the general bill if I thought it would not give rise to a discussion not alone here but at the other end of the Capitol, which would endanger the passage of any bill on the subject during this session. I trust that the substitute will be adopted.

Mr. PLATT. I wish that the Senator from New Jersey as well as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations would consent that this matter may go over until to-morrow without prejudice, with a tacit understanding that it shall be taken up then, and for these reasons: There is to be held in London next May an international inventions exhibition, to which attention was specially called in the message of the President of the United States communicated to Congress at this session. I will read from the President's message what he says:

An international inventions exhibition is to be held in London next May. This will cover a field of special importance, in which our country holds a foremost rank; but the Executive is at present powerless to organize a proper representation of our vast national interests in this direction.

The inventors of this country have been very anxious that some bill should be passed by Congress which should enable the inventive progress of this country to be displayed at that exhibition, and I had supposed that under the general bill which it was proposed to pass something might be done.

It will be remembered that the Patent Office is the only branch of this Government which yields a revenue to the Government over and above the expenditures necessary to carry it on. There is in the Treasury of the United States to-day a fund amounting to something like $3,000,000 which has been derived from the Patent Office. It has been paid to this Government by inventors who have made applications for patents and to whom patents have been granted or whose applications have been rejected.

Certainly it is a matter of as much importance for this country to show what progress has been made in the art of invention as to show what progress has been made in any other direction by our people. The inventors feel that there can be no exhibition which can be more properly patronized by this Government than the exhibition which is to take place in London next May.

I am not prepared to submit any amendment and am not prepared to say exactly what I desire to do with reference to the matter before the Senate. Therefore I suggest that the bill may lie on the table until to-morrow morning, when it may be taken up and pressed to a conclusion. I hope the suggestion will be satisfactory to the Senators who are promoting and in charge of the bill.

Mr. SEWELL. If the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations will consent I have no objection to the bill lying over until to-morrow morning so that it may be amended to cover the views of the Senator from Connecticut, provided we have general consent to take it up to-morrow morning. It is very important that we should have early action upon it.

Mr. PLATT. We can take it up to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I simply rise to correct what I believe to be a very grave mistake of my distinguished friend from Connecticut; and he is not in the habit of making mistakes. I understood him to say that there was a surplus now in the United States Treasury of some $3,000,000 arising from the Patent Office fees paid into the Government over and above all the expenditures of that office. That statement has often been made, and it has long been claimed that the Patent Office was yielding a clear net surplus to the Government over and above all its expenses. I took some occasion last winter to have the matter thoroughly investigated and to have the figures revised, and when they were revised by the present Commissioner, General Butterworth, they showed a different state of facts from what had been represented. There is no $3,000,000 in the Treasury arising from that source, and it has only been within the last year or two that the office has been self-sustaining.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from Missouri refer me to the document in which this revision of the figures has been made?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will refer the Senator to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, at whose instance the Commissioner was requested last session to revise and examine the report which he had already made and which had been printed, showing the immense surplus. The Senator from Kansas who is not now in his seat [Mr. PLUMB] (the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was also present) and a number of us had doubted the correctness of these figures. We told the Commissioner we doubted them and asked him to go back to his office and revise and correct them and report to us the exact status, which he did, confessing that his printed report was incorrect, and he gave us the real figures.

Mr. PLATT. What is the amount which had been derived from the Patent Office over and above its expenditures?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not remember exactly now. He gave it to us, however; but I do not know whether it has ever been printed in a document or not.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator that the statement of the Commissioner of Patents to our committee only covered a single year or two years. We did not ask him to go back, as my recollection is now.

Mr. COCKRELL. But the Senator will remember that the Commissioner told us he made his estimates on the estimates of his predecessors, and when he examined he found that his predecessors had left off a very large item of expense.

Mr. ALLISON. So I remember; but I think the Commissioner of Patents for the year 1883 stated to us that the excess of fees over expenditures, including all expenses for printing and everything connected with the expenditures of the office, amounted to $175,000 in round numbers.

Mr. COCKRELL. Last year?

Mr. ALLISON. That is my recollection.

Mr. PLATT. Of course, Mr. President, I have had no means of determining this question from conferences which have been had between the Commissioner and the Committee on Appropriations. The published documents of the Commissioner and all the official documents set forth that the fund amounts to about $3,000,000. I gave the figures in a speech which I had the honor to deliver here during the last session. I never heard any question made until to-day. Of course I have had no opportunity to investigate this new claim, but I venture to say that whatever revision the Commissioner may have put upon his former figures and estimates, there is still a very large surplus in the Treasury derived from the operations of the Patent Office.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no doubt of that, but what the amount is I would not like to state from the information given us by the Commissioner.

Mr. DAWES. Has this matter gone over?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). It has not. The Senator from Connecticut ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey been printed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been.

Mr. MILLER, of California. There is no objection to the bill going over, retaining its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the further consideration of the bill is postponed until to-morrow.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF NEWTON, MASS.

Mr. DAWES. What is the pending business now, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Calendar under the eighth rule.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the unfinished business under that rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no unfinished business during the morning hour.

Mr. DAWES. There was a bill before the Senate when the Calendar was last considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the bill referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 378, being the bill (S. 1331) making appropriation for the relief of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] had the floor when 2 o'clock arrived the last time the bill was under consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. Perhaps it is due to the Senate that I should complete the remarks which were interrupted by the arrival of 2 o'clock, when this bill was previously under discussion.

I had stated then as to $43,000 of this claim which was represented by Government interest-bearing bonds belonging to the Newton bank which were transferred by the fraudulent combination between the officers of that bank and the officer of the United States at Boston. I thought it was clear that the bank was entitled to interest; to pay interest to that extent would be simply returning what the Government received; but I think it is quite a different question whether the Government should pay interest on money that has come into its Treasury, and whether it is to return all the money that did come into its Treasury. As to the interest-bearing bonds, the principal as well as the interest did come into the Treasury of the United States, and in making restitution the interest as well as the principal should be repaid. I stated before that I thought it was quite a different question as to the money, the currency that came into the Treasury in the method which has been several times described.

It can not be said that the bank was without fault. Its managing officers, those who were held out to the world as authorized to deal with the public in its transactions were participes criminis in this fraud; they combined with the officer of the United States to enable him to practice a fraud upon the Government of the United States upon its Treasury.

Now it may be that the bank under the circumstances is not to be held bound by their act; that is, the United States having parted with no valuable thing on the faith of their act, as matter of law the bank is now entitled to say, "You pay us back that money." The courts of the United States have so held, and the doctrine of course is not to be impeached here by us, for I take it, as it was held in this case, that it is strictly res adjudicata. But what was the duty of the officer at Boston who attempted this fraud? What was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury? Here is a claim made by this bank to have the currency put in the subtreasury returned. I take it that it must be admitted even by all who support this claim that the case was one where the officers in charge of the public funds of the United States might well challenge proof; that it was not a case where the United States Treasury at Boston, or the Secretary of the Treasury, the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], I believe, at that time, upon this claim being made, could say "The money must be returned." It was plainly the duty of those officers to have that matter judicially investigated, to require proof to be made of the circumstances under which the money came into the Treasury. That proof, when it was made, disclosed fraudulent participation on the part of the officers of this bank, but not to a degree to hold the bank answerable for their act. Now it seems to me that when the principal is returned as to that sum, it is making an exception in a weak case rather than a strong one for the Government to pay interest upon that money.

I have not felt interest enough in this case to attempt to search out all the precedents that have relation to it or that might be thought to be in line with it or to throw light upon it; but, so far as I recollect, whenever the question of paying interest upon money refunded by the Government has arisen in any committee of this body of which I have been a member, and so far as I know has arisen on the floor of the Senate, in every case since I have been here interest has been refused. We are frequently having cases here where money has been taken illegally by a tax officer of the United States in good faith but upon erroneous construction of the customs or internal-revenue laws of the country. The money is levied under duress, under stress of law; it is paid under protest; the party paying it is in no manner in fault; he is asserting his rights, but he yields to the power of the Government and pays the money in. I do not believe that in any case where the judgment of the collector has been reversed by the courts, and Congress has been appealed to to repay that money, we have paid interest. Perhaps we ought to pay it; perhaps in all such cases we ought to adopt on the part of the Government precisely the rule that would prevail between individuals. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] may be right when he insists upon such a rule; but as to that I make this point, that if such a rule is to be established, it ought to be established by a general law, which would authorize the Court of Claims or any other tribunal having jurisdiction of a claim against the Government that appoints it to award it, and it ought to be made applicable to all cases of persons whose property is wrongfully taken or withheld by the Government, of all persons to whom the United States is indebted.

I object that in a particular case, contrary to the practice of the Senate, at least so far as my observation goes, interest should be allowed without any attempt to make general the rule which is applied here in the case of a bank that was not without fault, that had commissioned and introduced to the public officers who were corrupt men and whose participation brought about this very trouble—I object that in a case like that the rule should be applied when it is not applied in cases where there is absolutely no fault on the part of the claimant, but the money is exacted from him by the Government. I think in this case if this is to be the rule—and it may be the just rule—it should be made the rule by general provision of law, and not adopted in exceptional cases. So far as I recollect there never has been a claim passed in the Senate since I have been here upon which interest has been allowed.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, this bill has consumed so much of the time of the Senate that I should not feel justified in asking their attention to anything I might add to what has already been said upon the subject, did I not feel that the Senators who have opposed the passage of the bill have failed to understand the legal condition of this question, arising from their want of opportunity to understand all the facts of the case. I am quite sure the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Missouri who have opposed this bill, just men as they are, although disposed as they are to guard the Treasury of the United States, if they really understood the facts as they exist and their legal bearing on this case, would be the last men in the Senate to oppose the passage of the bill.

The character of the transaction out of which this bill has arisen has been before the Supreme Court of the United States, and they have declared what is the legal condition of this case, and have declared that the funds of the Newton bank were stolen from that bank, that the United States was the receiver of the stolen goods with the guilty knowledge of its agent, who deposited them in its Treasury; I do not mean to say the guilty knowledge of anybody who has had the management of this affair except that agent. I agree with the Senator from Indiana, that the circumstances presented a case which called for investigation; but if the Senate desire to know what the Supreme Court of the United States say in reference to the facts in this case it is easily accessible. There were two banks robbed, both at the same time, and by the same men, and by the same process. One case had gone through all the courts to the Supreme Court, and in the ninety-sixth United States Reports, The United States vs. The State Bank, the facts came before the court, and they declared that by a fraudulent conspiracy between two officers of the bank and an officer of the Government the bank was robbed of its securities and they were deposited in the United States Treasury by one of the guilty parties; and having been so robbed, the property, the title to the securities, still remained in the Newton bank, the securities and moneys were its property when they were deposited in the subtreasury by the guilty officer of the United States. The transaction itself is defined in the Massachusetts statutes as larceny. It could not be otherwise than larceny. A secret conspiracy to obtain clandestinely the funds of the bank and convert them fraudulently to the use of a third person is defined by the Supreme Court of the United States as larceny. The United States, then, without the moral guilt of anybody but the first party participating in it, received these bonds as receivers of stolen goods. With full knowledge of the facts communicated to them they prosecuted the offender and sent him to the penitentiary, and after that full knowledge the Newton bank demanded the return of its securities.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him, simply by way of information, what became of the officers of the bank?

Mr. DAWES. I shall not omit to discuss the fact that one of them was equally in the fraud and wrong, just as much a party to this larceny as the officer of the Government.

The Newton bank demanded its securities. The United States officers declined to give them up. The State Bank, which was robbed at the same time, commenced a suit against the United States to recover its securities. The Newton bank waited until within three days of six years for that suit to be decided, and it not being decided, and it not being able to wait any longer without losing its opportunity, commenced its suit. That suit was, by order of court, continued until the decision of the first case. In the decision of the first case by the Supreme Court it was held that the property in these securities continued in the bank, and that the United States in receiving them, stolen as they were, was holding them against right, and they must be delivered up.

The United States continued to resist the case of the Newton bank, and it was compelled to carry its case to judgment. In 1882, fifteen years after the transaction, which happened on the 28th day of February, 1867, after fifteen years of struggle to get the United States to deliver up what the law said were stolen goods in its hands, the bank got a judgment for the goods, and the United States then appealed that case to the Supreme Court as it had the other. Six months afterward the Attorney-General, upon examining the case, finding it to be precisely the case that had already been decided in the Supreme Court, withdrew his appeal, and then the Newton bank obtained its securities after the lapse of a little over fifteen years. It is now seventeen years since the transaction. What were the securities? Forty-seven thousand dollars of them were interest-bearing bonds of the United States, and the United States cut the coupons from those bonds that it knew—for the facts were all before it—were stolen from our bank, and the Supreme Court had declared that the property in those bonds was in the Newton bank. For fifteen years the United States cut the coupons from those bonds and put their proceeds into the Treasury; it took the other securities and sold them for cash, and the cash was either used to buy in its own interest-bearing bonds or was put in the place of money in the Treasury that was used for that purpose. The United States used the funds. The United States used our property fifteen long years before it delivered it up to us, and having had that use fifteen years—having put into its own Treasury our coupons and had the use of our money—at last under a judgment of court it says: "We will deliver you back your securities, but we will keep in our Treasury all they have earned." If these securities were at 6 per cent., they have more than earned in that time the full amount of the securities themselves. So the United States was able, if the position taken by my friend is correct, to hold property which the United States had declared it had no right to use until it had earned from it enough to pay for it. That is the legal position of this thing.

Of course I am charging no moral guilt upon any official of the United States except the one who stole the goods and deposited them in the United States Treasury. It was right and proper that the United States should, before it delivered them up, take the opinion of the highest tribunal, and it was right and proper and fair when it did obtain that opinion to make restitution not only of the principal which it had held all that time, but of all it had earned. It is precisely the same as if the United States during the war, or under any other circumstances, had taken possession of some building in this city for its uses, and held it against the owner and compelled the owner to resort to the courts to recover possession and at the end of fifteen years and under a judgment of the courts had come and said: "We will deliver up to you possession of this building of yours, but we will not pay you anything for the use of it." It is precisely the same thing as if A had stolen B's horse, and put it into C's hands with the guilty knowledge on the part of C that this was a stolen horse, and C resists the return of that horse for fifteen long years, and when the court compels him to return the horse he is to pay nothing for the use of it! That is the legal aspect of this case.

My friend from Missouri says it is a stale claim. It is, I am sorry to say, seventeen years old. But why is it seventeen years old? Is it from any omission on the part of the Newton bank to press its claim? The Newton bank made demand for the return of its securities immediately upon the disclosure of the facts and after the United States had indicted and sent to the penitentiary the guilty agent, and it waited six years within three days, and my friend from Missouri thought that was against it. I take it that instead of that being against the bank, it showed a disposition on its part to meet the United States fairly in an investigation. There was a suit pending all this time involving precisely the same facts, and when the bank's representatives commenced their suit at the end of the six years it was by the court continued until the other case could be decided; and when the other case was decided the United States instead of taking that decision to govern itself in this case continued its resistance in the Court of Claims, and it was several years then before judgment was obtained in the Court of Claims, and when it was had in the Court of Claims the United States appealed it to the Supreme Court, and it was six months after the appeal before the Attorney-General here on examination of the case found that it was precisely the same case decided already by the Supreme Court and withdrew his appeal.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator will allow me to ask him whether any of the proceedings taken on the part of the United States in regard to this bank were intended for delay, or whether it was not action absolutely necessary to protect the Government from a claim that was made upon it? Was not the action of the officers of the Government perfectly legitimate?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Delaware is aware that, as I have already stated, I lay no charge of complaint against these officers. It was proper for them to make a fair, thorough investigation. If there is any ground of complaint against them on account of the delay, it is that after having had the decision in the first case they did not consider themselves as governed in this case by it. That they caused it to be delayed in the courts for the sake of delay I do not charge; and I do not charge that it was on the whole, according to the sense of duty of the officers, an unreasonable delay on their part; but it put us in such a position that the Senator from Missouri ought not to have charged upon us that this is a stale case. That was what I was meeting.

Then the Senator from Michigan said he could not understand how it was possible that the Supreme Court could have decided that the restitution should be made when the bank's officers were just as much in the fraud as the officer of the United States. Now, Mr. President, I think I can make that perfectly plain. It is under a principle of law that the Senator from Michigan will as quickly recognize as anybody else. The officers of the bank and the United States officer conspired and were equally guilty in the robbery and the reception of the stolen goods. The United States wants to hold on to the goods obtained by means of the fraud; it wants to ratify and adopt the fraud in order to hold on to the goods. The Newton bank repudiates the fraud. The United States can not claim any title or right whatever except through the fraud. The Newton bank, however, repudiates the fraud, goes into court and says: "You have through fraud our funds;" and the United States answers thus: "We have your funds through fraud, a fraud in which your officer participated as well as ours; now we will ratify and adopt the fraud and hold on to the funds." The Newton bank says: "No; you hold them by and through a fraud which can not give you any title;" and the United States Supreme Court discuss and decide that very point, and it seems to me to be as sound law as could possibly be enunciated. That is my answer to my friend from Indiana a moment ago. He says the bank was not without fault. The bank was without fault. It was an officer of the bank, like the officer of the United States Treasury, that was in fault. The bank was not responsible because one of its officers turned thief, and the bank is not to lose its title to its property because two thieves got together and put it somewhere else; and it can not be held by the person having it unless he ratifies and adopts the fraud itself.

One other objection on the part of the Senator from Michigan was that this was in the hands of speculators; that the claim to these securities had been sold by the receiver of the bank and sold for a farthing, and that speculators were prosecuting this claim in their interest. When asked for his proof, for the evidence, the Senator said that that must be so, although there was no evidence of it, and he finally in the argument put it "in the hands of speculators, perhaps," and thereupon argued "shall we pay interest to those who held it as speculators?" In the absence of all proof that this was in the hands of anybody except the real owners, my friend from Michigan ought to have abstained from that remark. My colleague is upon the committee which reported this bill, and he knows more thoroughly than I do all the facts in the case. But I happen to know of it, for it is a case which attracted so much attention in Massachusetts that every one had some knowledge of it. This statement was news to me, as it was to my colleague on that day, and we searched in vain in the record for anything to justify my friend in that remark, and my colleague has since put in my hands a letter written to him by the counsel in this case before the discussion came up, a gentleman of as high character as lives in Massachusetts, who, writing to him about the points in this case, without any disposition to cover any point in it, uses this language, which I desire to read as a statement of a responsible member of the bar of Massachusetts, above possibility of reproach:

This case is most meritorious in this, that the original sufferers will receive the money. The beneficial interest in not a single share of the stock has been transferred, I believe, from the beginning; and the stockholders and creditors at the time will receive the amount granted.

So that I think unless my friend can produce some evidence that this statement is not correct, he ought to give up that point. Now, sir, why should the United States——

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator allow me a word about that?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. The report shows that there was a receiver appointed for the bank who received the assets of the bank. There is nothing to show whether they were sold and whether this claim goes to one class or another. It is the duty of a party presenting his claim here to make a clean case, not for me or for any other Senator to make it for him.

One other thing I call the attention of the Senator to. There is nothing in this bill that tells to whom this money shall be paid. It does not say to the Newton bank. There is no such clause in the bill. I will not detain the Senate now, but I call the Senator's attention to that.

Mr. DAWES. Is it not a sufficient answer to the Senator from Michigan, as my colleague and the chairman of the Committee on Claims have suggested to me, in the absence of all evidence that this has been sold, that the statute prohibits the sale? In point of fact the receiver held these assets for the benefit of the bank. They have not been sold. From my personal knowledge I am justified in saying they have not been sold. If the Senator has any evidence that they have, let him present it and I will take back the statement. I put upon the record the statement of a member of the Massachusetts bar, than whose no name would go further in the assertion of a fact.

I was about to inquire why the United States should pay interest. It is true that when men deal with the United States they do not expect interest as between them and the United States unless there is an agreement to pay interest, because they deal with the United States on the cash principle. When they have contracts with the United States they expect cash down and get no interest, unless they stipulate for interest, and the United States does not in those cases pay interest. But this bank did not deal with the United States. The United States has held for fifteen years the securities of this bank, not with the consent of the bank but against its will. They were taken without right from us and were held by the United States for these fifteen years without right. They earned in that time more than the principal, and the United States has it in its Treasury at this moment. In all such cases interest should be paid. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] has recited fifty cases, my colleague says. Look in the report and see the list of acts of the United States where the United States have given interest in cases where they had the property of a citizen without the citizen's consent; and look at the right of it. Is the United States to say to one of its citizens, "We have got into our Treasury, against your consent, your funds; we will keep them in our Treasury until their earnings will more than amount to the principal, and then we will turn them over to you and keep the benefit of their earnings." Nobody would put the United States in that position, but that is the position in this case.

Here was a small bank of $150,000 capital robbed of more than twice its capital in securities, and those securities came into the possession of the United States under circumstances that the Supreme Court say, at the end of fifteen years, "You should have returned them in the beginning." Without moral fault, in keeping them so long the United States has nevertheless kept them out of the possession of their rightful owner so long and they have earned to the United States more than the principal itself; and does the United States seek to put that in its pocket and deliver over the securities? That is why this bill should pass. It secures that end; and I do not think that the sense of justice of my friend from Michigan, as high and as keen as that of any other Senator, notwithstanding his proper and just zeal in defending the United States against unjust claims, can prompt him to put the United States in such a position as with one hand gathering without right property of the citizen and with the other reaping the profits of it until they amount to more than the principal, and then quieting itself and contenting itself with delivering up the principal.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I should be very glad if any of the arguments which have been made by the two Senators from Massachusetts upon this bill relating to a claim of their constituents could satisfy me of the propriety of paying this $300,000 and over of interest on a claim where, it seems to me, the moral wrong of the initiation of the whole transaction was with the officers of this bank.

It is well enough for a Senator here to arraign the United States as a robber and its officers as thieves and villains, and quote the opinion of the Supreme Court in another case that in the case they were speaking of there was villainy and robbery on the part of the United States through its officers. But the Senator forgets that there was drawn out of the Treasury of the United States the very money in dispute by the officers of this bank. One of the officers of the bank, who procured this money to be taken from the bank and placed in the subtreasury to make the accounts balance when the examiner came along, was the man who drew out of the subtreasury by connivance with the subtreasurer this whole amount of money. A member of the firm of Mellon, Ward & Co., this report says, got the money out of the Treasury by collusion with the subtreasurer, and when his accounts were to be investigated by the examiner sent to see how the money in that subtreasury stood and to examine the accounts of the subtreasurer, the subtreasurer very naturally said to this officer of the bank, "Bring back that money that contrary to law I have taken out of my deposit of United States moneys and given to you for your use; put it back so that I can be saved." The obligation to return the money to the United States was above all this villainous transaction which, with that peculiar choice of language, the Senator from Massachusetts sees fit to charge against the United States as a whole and its officers as a part.

Mr. DAWES. Why, Mr. President, I did not make that statement. The opinion of the court says that it was "a villainous scheme;" I used the words of the Supreme Court.

Mr. CONGER. I said so; I said that in another case——

Mr. DAWES. No; in this case.

Mr. CONGER. In another case the Senator read a decision of the Supreme Court. Does he contend that this case ever went to the Supreme Court? The Senator says it was an analogous case; and because in that particular case on its own facts the court said a transaction was villainous——

Mr. DAWES. The chief-justice of the Court of Claims, in delivering the opinion of the court in this case, uses the words, "It was a villainous scheme."

Mr. CONGER. Yes.

Mr. DAWES. I did not use it quite as strong as that. I said that I acquitted every officer of the Government, except the original thief, of any moral guilt in this matter. The Senator knows that I did not lay to the charge of the Government any unreasonable delay. In answer to the Senator from Delaware I said that I could not say that there was unreasonable delay, but it nevertheless was a delay.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, the Senator said that. I am not speaking of that part of it.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator must not accuse me of calling the United States a robber. I did not do that.

Mr. CONGER. I did not talk about that part of the case at all. As usual the Senator has shielded himself behind the decision of the Supreme Court quoted here. He did not read from it but quoted it from memory with that remarkable tenacity of memory which can hit upon the very thing desired for his remarks.

Mr. DAWES. Here is the report made by the Senator from Tennessee in this case which shows the language of the court.

Mr. CONGER. I have the report before me. The Supreme Court never passed an opinion in this case, and never characterized it as I understood the Senator to say they had; but he says that in an analogous case they said that the other fellow was a scoundrel and a thief who dealt with the bank and that the Government justified the fraud by resisting it. Well, sir, I will not engage in a discussion with the Senator as to whether that be a proper observation to make against the Government of the United States, a great part of which the Senator is.

I was saying, and I ask attention to it because it has a bearing on this case, that the report showed on its very first page that a person by the name of Hartwell was cashier of the United States subtreasury in Boston, and that—

While acting as such cashier he embezzled a large amount of the Government's money by lending the same to the firm of Mellon, Ward & Co., who were extensively engaged in stock speculations.

That is the first history, I think, of this transaction. The money in the subtreasury was loaned by Hartwell, the subtreasurer, to Mellon, Ward & Co. for stock purposes. As I said, when the examiner of the Treasury was coming around for his examination Hartwell very naturally went to the managing director of the bank, who was the managing man of Mellon, Ward & Co., and said: "Restore here, that I may be saved, the money I loaned you." He brought back these securities. Whether they were the exact securities and moneys which Hartwell, the subtreasurer, had loaned to the director of the bank, I do not know The probability is that they were. First they had been stolen from the Government and delivered over to Mellon, Ward & Co.; second, when the subtreasurer was in danger of an examination and of being found in the wrong, he asked Mellon, Ward & Co., or the manager of the bank who was manager of that firm, to place back in the subtreasury the securities he had let them have, and they did it. Up to that time then in justice and in equity, in law and in right, the manager of the bank and its cashier merely took out of the bank securities and moneys which came from the subtreasury and put them back into the subtreasury.

That is the history of this case undisputed on the record and on the first page of the report. The officer of the bank committed the first wrong and got the Government money into the bank's possession, and, as it was bound to do with its accomplice in iniquity, it restored it or its equivalent to the subtreasury, and there it was at the time of the examination, and thus the accounts were made good. When it had served the purpose of making the subtreasurer's accounts good the bank wanted the securities shifted back again to the manager and cashier of this bank. From the beginning until the end, from the best reading that I can find and from all the testimony, this money or its equivalent was first loaned from the United States by the partner of Mellon, Ward & Co., or borrowed, and it was put back to cover up the fraud and to save Hartwell, the subtreasurer; and then it was to go back again. Here was this money floating back and forth between the Treasury of the United States and this bank with the connivance and consent of its manager, for the purposes of fraud all the way through. That is what makes me wonder how any court, when the case was properly presented as it is in the report, could have decided, the first wrong being the possession of the Government property to this amount by a fraudulent connivance of its officer, that when it was restored, although it may have been in fraud of some right, it could be claimed that it belonged to the bank or anybody else but the Government.

But I will not dwell upon that. I think this case lacks so much evidence and the bill is drawn in such a way that the report throws no light upon it. This property and all the property of the bank, with all its rights, went into the hands of a receiver, as the report shows. I have a right to conclude that all that did belong to the bank then belonged to the receiver and went to pay the debts of the bank, for it is said it was robbed, and in order to keep the bank going the old stockholders had to renew their subscriptions and make a new deposit.

I say there is nothing before the Senate to show that the deficit of the subtreasurer was not caused by the loans of the subtreasurer to the officers of the bank. There is nothing in the report or in the bill to show who will receive this interest; what estate. The bill says that interest shall be paid upon a judgment rendered. Rendered to whom? Who received the proceeds of the former judgment? The bill is worded so carefully that it does not even tell to whom the money shall go, either by implication or directly, and there is nothing to show who will receive this interest. It is the duty of those coming here to demand this three hundred or more thousand dollars of interest on money that the bank officers have stolen from the Government, and which these same iniquitous bank officers for an iniquitous purpose restored to the subtreasury, to show to whom the money is to go. There is nothing in the bill or in any of the proceedings here to show that any one of the innocent sufferers of the bank will receive one cent of this amount if it is returned.

I think this report lacks having given attention to the prima facie considerations which the report itself sets up. Commence with the fraud of the officers of this bank in robbing the subtreasury, and then follow it with the connivance of the subtreasurer and of Mellon, Ward & Co., and the general manager of the bank and the cashier of it, these securities finally got back into the subtreasury where they belonged, where they should have been. It was the money of the Government that was stolen; it was the money of the United States that was returned. But for the managing director, both of the bank and of the firm of Mellon, Ward & Co., with the connivance of the cashier, who, the report says, was under his influence and direction, the Government never would have been robbed in the first instance; there never would have been any occasion for carrying on this drama of iniquity between the officers of this bank and an unfaithful officer of the Government. If Senators can see how the Treasury of the United States can be protected against ten thousand times ten thousand claims that can be brought up in Congress on all the innumerable matters which have been settled and the judgments paid and the cases disposed of years after the occurrences took place—if Senators can see how they can protect the money of the people of the United States by the passage of such a bill as this, be it so; but I can not. Here the officers of this bank engaged in the first iniquity, and took the money in the first instance from the United States; and afterward, for a temporary purpose, for the sake of their colleague in complicity, they tried to make good the United States, temporarily, and the United States got possession of its own money. I do not see how a court would ever return it to the bank, and, least of all can I see with what kind of propriety any man who has examined even this report can come here and accuse the United States and its honorable officers, who have kept the money in the Treasury, of villainy and robbery up to this time, and defend a bank whose principal officers first stole from the United States, and then placed the money they had stolen back, temporarily, to conceal their fraud, and then came and got a judgment against the United States and received back the whole of what they had first stolen from the United States, and now, years afterward, come in here and demand more than the principal to be paid in interest.

Sir, I have done what I conceive to be my duty in thus calling the attention of Senators to a case which has not been investigated enough; and if the Senate shall pass this bill it will open the way for a long army, a long line of claims, innumerable in number and overshadowing in importance, which will gather around the Treasury of the United States and demand compensation. So far as I remember the cases and have had an opportunity to know them, I venture to say that there is not one single case of the great array which have been submitted here in the course of the administration of this Government, which is on all fours with this, where interest has been paid. Questions of public policy in our treaty stipulations, questions of public right and of public demand enter into many of the cases cited in the report, like the Alabama claims treaty questions, which do not affect the general course of the United States. In regard to many of those cited interest has been paid, not to those who first stole the money from the United States and then got it again, not to the original trespassers, but where there was in equity and right a reason why the Government should not only restore the value of the property taken, but also should make remuneration for its use

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand from his statement that the managing director of the bank was concerned in the original fraud.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir; and the managing director of the firm which took the original money out of the Treasury.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to follow that with a suggestion. If that be true, that director was undoubtedly a stockholder in the bank, and the bill would then return to him his share as a stockholder in the bank of this very money, notwithstanding that he was the party who originally got the money which was extracted from the United States Treasury. Unless he is excepted from the benefits of this proposed act he as a stockholder of the bank would be getting a share of this very money.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to read from the report, so that it shall not be, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, with some little undercurrent of malignity, that——

Mr. HOAR. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CONGER. For what purpose?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will permit me to say in reference to what——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will please address the Chair. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CONGER. I will yield as soon as I read from the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. CONGER. I call the attention of Senators to the beginning of the report. It begins in this way:

That on and prior to February 28, 1867, Julius F. Hartwell was cashier of the United States subtreasury in Boston, Mass. While acting as such cashier he embezzled a large amount of the Government's money by lending the same to the firm of Mellon, Ward & Co., who were extensively engaged in stock speculations. As the time for the examination of the funds in the subtreasury approached, March 1, 1867, when Hartwell's accounts would have to be passed, some plan had to be devised by the guilty parties to prevent or delay exposure. The device resorted to and put in operation was to procure funds and assets of innocent third parties to be placed temporarily on deposit in the subtreasury till the examination was had, and then to be immediately withdrawn again, and thus tide Hartwell and his associates in the embezzlement over the crisis. Edward Carter, the active financial member of said firm of Mellon, Ward & Co., who concocted this scheme with Hartwell, was a director in the First National Bank of Newton, and seems to have possessed not only the confidence of, but unlimited influence over, E. Porter Dyer, the cashier of said bank. By means of this confidence and influence, and in execution of his and Hartwell's fraudulent conspiracy, Carter procured from Dyer the money, bonds, securities, and checks of the First National Bank of Newton, to the amount of $371,025, which were deposited in the subtreasury on February 28, 1867, Hartwell giving a receipt therefor, as cashier, that the deposit was "to be returned on demand in Governments, or bills, or its equivalent"—

Not this money—

This receipt, being in the name of Mellon, Ward & Co., was immediately indorsed by Carter, as follows: "Pay only to the order of E. Porter Dyer, jr., cashier"—

The cashier of the Newton bank—and signed, Mellon, Ward & Co.

That is the condition of the case, and I have expressed it as plainly as language can, that the paying of this money back into the bank by Dyer, the cashier, by Carter, the director, and by Mellon, Ward & Co., who had received this money, or Carter had received it from Mellon, Ward, & Co., of which firm he was the manager, shows that it was the second transfer. When this got back into the Treasury of the United States it was the third transfer of money: first, from Hartwell to Carter, the managing director of the bank; second, the return by Carter of this or other proceeds in equivalent amount to make Hartwell good; and third, the decree of the court, which found that this money belonged to the officers and stockholders of the bank on account of the fraud of Hartwell and of Dyer. There can not be a plainer case.

If it had been a clear case on the other side it did not need fifteen or twenty pages of report to show it. There were many other things which ought to have come in, to which I have alluded. There is no notice taken of the obligation of the bank to make good the fraud or the borrowing of these officers, of Carter, the director, from the subtreasury in violation of all law. There is no attempt to make the United States good, but the company come and get back the money which belongs in right and in law and in equity to the United States, and when they got money enough to pay back this which I say they never had the right to, they have the effrontery to come into this Congress and ask to be paid over $300,000 of interest on these securities while they were in litigation.

Now, sir, I think the precedent to be established for such a payment of interest on such a claim as this, crimsoned all over with iniquity and fraud and wrong and treachery against the Government of the United States, will be very unfortunate on future claims that may come before Congress; and that is why I oppose the bill more than that I know or care anything about the persons in this case. I know and care nothing in regard to who this money goes to as a matter of fact. It seems as if a large part of it would go to the principal actor in these frauds.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] to the text of the bill.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to make a remark before that motion is put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California withdraw the motion?

Mr. MILLER, of California. I do, to enable the Senator from Illinois to make a remark.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not feel disposed to resist the motion of the Senator from California to go into executive session, for the reason that, as I am informed, there are some important considerations why there should be an executive session to-day; but I desire to say that when the interstate-commerce bill, which now goes upon the Calendar as unfinished business, is again taken up, I hope that the Senate will allow the consideration of it to go forward until it is concluded.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 1004) relative to the Chinese indemnity fund was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope the Senator from California will allow me to make a report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I will yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California withdraw his motion?

Mr. MILLER, of California. For the present.

Mr. MANDERSON. I report back from the Committee on Printing without amendment a resolution to print certain documents, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California withdraws his motion, and the Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Printing at this time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The resolution reported by the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Senate Executive Document No. 78, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, parts 1, 2, and 3, be included in the publication of the 500 copies of Senate Executive Documents No. 112, Forty-sixth Congress, No. 194, Forty-seventh Congress, and No. 26, Forty-eighth Congress, ordered printed by resolution of the Senate on the 13th instant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution. The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to it.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7964) to provide for the expense and compensation of special messengers to be sent by the Secretary of State to the States, respectively, of Iowa and Oregon for the certificates of the electoral vote of 1884 for President and Vice-President of the United States, in pursuance of the provisions of section 141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 7964) to provide for the expense and compensation of special messengers to be sent by the Secretary of State to the States, respectively, of Iowa and Oregon for the certificates of the electoral vote of 1884 for President and Vice-President of the United States, in pursuance of the provisions of section 141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

A bill (S. 1820) to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 15, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILKINS. I demand the consideration of the special order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first, if there be no objection, lay before the House certain executive communications.

PURCHASE OF PRIVATE DIE STAMPS.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. WILKINS. I call for the regular order, and ask to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILKINS], under the special order made on the 15th of December last, calls up for consideration the bill S. 1155. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations.

Be it enacted, &c., That upon any deposit already or hereafter made of any United States bonds bearing interest in the manner required by law, any national banking association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, not exceeding in the whole amount the par value of the bonds deposited: Provided, That at no time shall the total amount of such notes issued to any such association exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock. And that all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That associations organized for the purpose of issuing notes payable in gold, under the provisions of section 5185 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, upon the deposit of any United States bonds bearing interest with the Treasurer of the United States, shall be entitled to receive circulating notes to the amount and in the manner prescribed in this act for other national banking associations.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. There has been so much confusion that, although paying the most careful attention, I have been unable to gather the drift of the bill as read by the reading clerk. I desire to inquire if the bill as read is what is known as the McPherson bill.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WELLER. Then I desire to inquire if it be proper at this time to offer a substitute for that bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILKINS] has the floor. The gentleman in charge of the bill under the rules of the House is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILKINS. I only desire to take a moment this morning in making a brief statement of the object of this bill.

Mr. HENLEY addressed the Chair.

Mr. WILKINS. I decline to yield to the gentleman. As I have stated, I desire only to take a moment in explaining the object of the bill, and will yield the balance of my time.

Mr. HENLEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENLEY. There was a great deal of tumult and confusion in the Hall at the time the gentleman from Ohio took the floor to call up the bill to which he is just about to speak. I did not know he had done that. I supposed when he opened his mouth just now he was on the floor for the purpose of calling up for consideration that measure. I intended to antagonize it with another matter which I have in charge.

The SPEAKER. That could not be done, because this day is set apart or dedicated by order of the House for the consideration of the two bills mentioned in the order.

Mr. MILLS. Could we not raise the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER. The House has set apart this day immediately after the reading of the Journal for the consideration of the bills. The order differs from a case in which a bill is made a special order merely. In that case the question of consideration can always be raised.

Mr. HENLEY. The Chair then rules that the question of consideration can not be raised?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not when the House has dedicated the day to the consideration of measures.

Mr. HENLEY. Then I beg to state that the notice I gave the other day will be rescinded on account of the condition of other business, and on Saturday I will call up the bill for the forfeiture of land grants to the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Mr. MILLS. What arrangement is to be made about the discussion of this bill? How much time is to be given for its discussion? We desire that both sides shall have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. WILKINS. I was just about to proceed to make a statement to the House when I was interrupted by the gentleman from California.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to take up the time of the House this morning in discussing this bill. I shall content myself with making a plain statement of the substance of the bill, and leave discussion to others; and I do this in order that other gentlemen who desire to be heard may have an opportunity, and that there may be full and fair discussion of this measure for a little while to-day.

Mr. MILLS. How long?

Mr. WILKINS. I expect that we shall call the previous question perhaps about half past 2 o'clock, thus giving two hours for the discussion of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. We desire to have an opportunity for a fair and full discussion of this bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I trust that the previous question will not be called in an hour and a half from this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILKINS] has the floor.

Mr. MILLS. But we want to know what opportunity our side is going to have to be heard on this bill?

Mr. WILKINS. The gentleman has no right to assume that I am upon the one side or upon the other, except that I am in favor of this bill.

Mr. MILLS. And I am against it.

Mr. WILKINS. I have no right to assume that the gentleman is on the other side.

Mr. MILLS. I think the gentleman from Ohio owes it to those who are opposed to this bill to give them some reasonable time to discuss it and not attempt to put it through under the gag law. And he will find it much easier to pass the bill by giving a fair opportunity for discussion than in the other way.

Mr. WILKINS. That is no doubt true.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILKINS] now has the floor to discuss this bill. When the proper time comes the Chair will, of course, recognize other gentlemen to make appeals to the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. WILKINS. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that our committee has but this afternoon for the discussion of two measures. Since the beginning of the Forty-eighth Congress the Committee on Banking and Currency have been endeavoring to be heard upon this floor, but not until we got this special order have we had an opportunity. I desire to extend to every gentleman upon this floor the opportunity of being heard for a short time—necessarily for a short time—upon this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to state the reasons why this bill is before Congress. At the assembling of this Forty-eighth Congress, in December, 1883, when the reports from the Departments were received, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, says:

The Secretary of the Treasury has been compelled, on account of the large receipts of revenue in excess of expenditures, to call in rapidly for payment that portion of the bonded debt which is payable at the pleasure of the United States. During the year ending November 1 more than one hundred and five millions ($105,322,450) of the public debt has been paid, and all of the remaining 3½ per cent. bonds, amounting to $91,596,250, have been called for payment, and ceased to bear interest on November 1. Notwithstanding the fact that two hundred and sixty-two new banks were organized during the past year, with a capital of $28,654,350, depositing $9,375,550 of bonds as a security for circulating notes, the aggregate amount on deposit for that purpose has diminished from $362,490,650 to $352,907,300, a reduction of $9,583,350. More than forty millions of 3½ percents held by the banks on November 1, 1882, have been withdrawn or called for payment; the threes have increased less than twenty-two millions, and the fours and four-and-a-halfs less than nine millions.

Unless there shall be legislation by the present Congress which shall reduce the receipts of the Government it is probable that the United States bonds will continue to be paid at the same rate as during the past year, in which event all the threes will be called for redemption within the next three years. This will reduce the bonds held by the banks from three hundred and fifty-three millions to one hundred and fifty-one millions, and cause a contraction in the national-bank circulation of about sixty millions per annum.

And further on in his report he recommended that his Department be authorized to issue circulating notes to national banks to the amount of 90 per cent. of the market value, the average market value of the bonds, for the twelve months prior to the deposit of bonds deposited as security. And, sir, in conformity with these views and recommendations a bill was introduced in the Senate by the Senator from Ohio, Mr. SHERMAN, and another by the Senator from Vermont, Mr. MORRILL. Other bills, no less than five in the Senate and possibly as many in the House, have been introduced, each embodying the views of its particular author although widely different in general plan, yet with the same end in view, namely, "to prevent undue contraction of the currency."

There was a funding bill introduced by Senator ALDRICH, and upon this floor two funding bills were introduced by my colleague [Mr. POTTER, of New York] because of this recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. Senator MCPHERSON, of New Jersey, introduced a bill in the Senate which received the consideration of that body—I hope I am not transcending the rules of this House in stating that fact. The bill introduced by Senator MCPHERSON received the consideration of the Senate as against all other funding bills and as against all other measures of relief presented in that body, and it passed there and has come to us for consideration.

This bill provides for an increase of the circulation of national banks from 90 per cent. of the par value of all classes of Government bonds deposited with the Treasury to secure such circulation to 100 per cent. or the par value of the bonds so deposited, but not to exceed the then actually paid-up capital. That is to say, the circulation based upon the bond is limited to the par value of the bond and to the sum the Government promises to pay the holder of the bond.

This, sir, is in brief the substance of the bill we are called upon to consider to-day. It is so simple, so comprehensive, that discussion seems a waste of time.

Mr. YAPLE obtained the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the gentleman in charge of this bill that an effort be made to reach an understanding as to the length of time to be occupied in debate.

Mr. WILKINS. I am perfectly willing to arrive at some understanding. I am quite ready to give the gentlemen opposed to the bill an hour and fifteen minutes, and we will occupy the same length of time.

Mr. MILLS. Say one hour and a half on each side.

Mr. YAPLE. Mr. Speaker, this interruption does not come out of my time?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The Chair understands that an effort is being made to arrive at some understanding as to the time to be occupied on the bill.

Mr. WELLER. This is too important a measure to be discussed on either side in an hour and a half.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that an hour be given to each side.

Mr. WILKINS. I would be very willing to do so; but, unfortunately, the other side will not consent.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Permit me to suggest that one or two hours' consideration for a measure making a vital change in our banking system is too short, and such a limitation ought not to be contemplated. I will suggest that the discussion for the present run on, and later in the debate we can better tell how much time is needed.

Mr. WILKINS. If the House will consent that after occupying to-day the bill go over till to-morrow, we are perfectly willing the discussion shall continue as long as gentlemen may desire.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, there are only two measures from this committee to be considered—the pending bill and the bill known as the "Dingley bill." If we confine ourselves in this discussion to the matters which really relate to the bills, if we do not run off into irrelevant and extraneous discussion, an hour on each side ought to be sufficient, and should enable members to discuss the question, and the House to decide it; but if general debate affecting everything connected with the national banks and legal-tenders is to go on, I presume two weeks would not satisfy the demands of gentlemen who would wish to engage in such discussion. I suggest, therefore, that my friends and the House ought to be satisfied with an hour on each side. I am opposed to this bill, and shall speak against it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope the House will not assent to having the discussion on this bill cut off with a single hour's debate on each side. I regard this bill as the most important measure before this House, and a fitting discussion of it cannot be had in one hour on either side. There should not be less than three hours allowed; and then the speakers must confine themselves strictly to the questions at issue.

Mr. WELLER. May I be permitted to make a suggestion? This is a bill, as I understand, changing in a large degree the financial policy of the Government; and it does seem to me to involve matters of so much importance that there should be a full and free discussion of the merits of the bill, so as to make but little consideration necessary upon the bill which is to succeed it. I hope, therefore, that the time for discussion will not be limited even to two hours or two hours and a half. I desire that there shall be at least three hours' discussion—an hour and a half on each side.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. WILKINS. I desire only to give notice to the House that we propose to call the previous question at 3 o'clock, and will give half the time to gentlemen opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YAPLE] is entitled to the floor. The House will be in order so that the gentleman may be heard.

Mr. YAPLE. Mr. Speaker, the real question before the House is how to make it profitable to the national banks to furnish the people a currency adequate to the demands of business. The Government is at the feet of Shylock. It is thought bysome that the passage of this bill will induce the banks to increase their circulation. Will this gift of $32,000,000 be a sufficient inducement? We have no assurance from the banks, and therefore we do not know. They are not compelled to take out another dollar of circulation. Will they do so? We do not know. Would it not be better to appoint a committee to ascertain just what their terms are? This appropriation may not be large enough. We are groping in the dark; the result is uncertain. Even the friends of the banks disagree. One gentleman says that if we do not pass this bill the banks will surrender their circulation. Another gentleman says that if we do pass this bill it will have the effect to increase the premium on the bonds so high as to tempt the banks to sell their bonds and go out of the banking business. The same result will follow—contraction of the currency—whether we pass the bill or not. What are we to do? What can we do to induce these gods who preside over the world of finance to save us from the evils of contraction? We are in their hands, and all we pray for is mercy. This is a Government of the banks, for the banks, and by the banks. Nobody denies that. If anybody ever did deny it, the spectacle of Congress making this bargain with them for a sufficient volume of currency would be conclusive evidence.

I think, sir, that the people have made sufficient offerings to these gods, and I shall vote against this proposition. I shall vote against any measure that tends to increase or perpetuate this national-bank currency. The ultimate object to be secured by this legislation is the perpetuity of the national banking system. That involves a perpetual national debt. There is no other basis for the system.

There can be no credit—

Says the Secretary of the Treasury—reliable enough for the basis of a national paper currency except the national credit. Nothing, therefore, but the bonds of the Government can perfectly secure a national-bank note circulation. Nothing else will answer the purpose.

No one seriously proposes any other security. Now, it is the duty of the Government to do the best thing it can with its debt, and that is to pay it. No one in this discussion will dare to openly advocate the perpetuation of our debt for the purpose of having it as basis for the national banking system, and yet unless it is to be continued this measure will only breed greater evils. It will increase the volume of bank currency to be retired with the payment of the bonds and in the end produce greater contraction. As a measure of relief from the evils of contraction it will be worse than a failure. As a means to fasten upon the people the burden of a permanent debt it will have dangerous force and effect. Every vote cast in favor of this bill will be a vote cast in favor of continuing a bond-based circulating medium. The bank note has no other source of life than the debt. To preserve the one you must continue the other.

It is not necessary that the nation continue in debt in order that it may possess itself of a sound currency, and it will not. The debt will be paid, and the national-bank currency must give way to some other. What will it be? It ought to be a currency cheap, convenient, and safe. It ought to be a legal tender for the payment of debts; or, in other words, possess the quality of money. The Government should never allow anything to pass as substitute for money. The legal tender should be equal in amount to the wants of business. It should be issued and its volume be controlled by the Government. Every argument which can be urged against a currency issued and controlled by the Government is equally good as against the currency issued and controlled by the banks. The bank currency is not an elastic, flexible currency. It does not increase and diminish in volume in answer to the demands of business. Its volume is not regulated by the requirements of trade. It depends on the profit it yields to the banks. In order to secure a dollar of it the Government must first guarantee a profit to the banks. In order to keep it in circulation it must continually increase that profit.

We have never had a more dangerous, treacherous currency, not even the wild-cat State-bank currency of former years. It is a political currency. It contracts under the prospect of Democratic success. It expands when the returns show a Republican victory. It was contracted $22,000,000 in the year 1876 and $15,000,000 in the year 1877 for no other reason in the world than to secure the success of the Republican party. It was contracted during the year 1881 and during the last year for no other purpose than to influence national legislation. The national banking association is a huge political machine at work in every township and village of the Union, subsidizing the press and corrupting the ballot.

There is nothing which can be said in favor of this currency which can not be said in favor of Government currency. The Treasury note has every virtue possessed by the bank note. It bears the impress of nationality. It circulates in every part of the Union. It does not stop at State lines. The bill-holder is perfectly secured.

It possesses virtues which the bank note does not. The profit on its circulation inures to the people. It saves interest. It is lawful money for the redemption of the bank note. It is legal tender.

We have always been compelled to resort to Government currency in emergencies. Banks of issue are banks of failure in every crisis of war or peace. It was the Treasury note that furnished the sinews of war when "liberty hung trembling in the balance." It armed and equipped the mightiest army that ever trod the earth. It built the strongest navy that ever floated the waters. It lighted the fires in our furnaces. It turned our rivers to weaving, carving, and grinding. It won the battle for freedom and saved the nation. It ought to be as sacred to us as the flag. [Applause.]

The banks instead of rendering any service to the Government are, like mendicants, always clamoring for aid from the Government. Already there have been introduced in this Congress, in their interest, bills to repeal the tax on their circulation, to give them the privilege of loaning money on real estate security, to suspend the coinage of silver, to refund the debt, and the bill under consideration to increase the profits on their circulation.

On what ground is this kind of legislation—increasing the profits of the business of a certain class by an act of Congress—justified? Is it on the ground that the people derive a benefit from the existence of the business? That is the ground on which the protective tariff and every other system of robbery is defended. That is the ground on which the invasion of the rights of the people by railroad corporations is justified. That is the ground on which every monopoly is built. The people derive a benefit from the existence of any legitimate business, and we have no right to discriminate and say that one business shall have a profit secured to it by the Government and that another must take care of itself.

Is it on the ground of necessity? There is no necessity. The Government is independent of the banks if it will but use its rightful powers. The plea of necessity is a confession that the Government is a failure.

Is it on the ground of expediency? Class legislation is the expedient of despotisms. Democracy knows no class but the whole people. This is the kind of legislation against which Lincoln warned us, legislation "placing capital above labor in the structure of the Government." It is the sickle with which capital harvests the fruits of labor.

It is a matter of regret that any one professing to be a Democrat should be the advocate and defender of a measure like this. A Democrat should vote favoritism and monopoly out of our laws; a Democrat should represent the people.

Sir, it is not bread that the banks are begging for; it is power. The purpose of all these measures is to give them increased power over the currency. They are seeking the control of all property and values which power over the currency gives. Where should this power rest? That is the supreme question. I oppose this bill because it helps to determine this question in favor of the banks. We are told that it would be unsafe, that it would be a dangerous experiment, to trust the exercise of this power to Congress. The theory of popular government can not exclude the exercise of sovereign powers from the representatives of the people. You can not lodge this power elsewhere without changing the nature of the Government. If the credit of the Government is a thing of value, is property, it is the property of the whole people, and we have no right to allow any individual or combination of individuals to appropriate it to their own private use and emolument. The constitutionality of the national bank can not be claimed except upon the theory that it is the fiscal agent of the Government to do the will of the Government with respect to the currency. That is the theory of its existence, but it is only a theory.

These moneyed corporations tremble at the idea of the people taking possession of the Government. Why should they? Is democracy a peril to capital?

What is democracy but justice enacted into law? The argument used to sustain the policy of delegating the control of the currency to national banking associations would end in delegating all the powers of Government to corporations. It would end in the destruction of the representative principle of our Government. History shows that this old argument against popular government, that it is unsafe to trust the people with power, has no foundation in fact. The experiment which all the world predicted would fail, the Republic of America, is proving a magnificent success. We need not fear the people. The more power they exercise the more democratic will be the Government. We have not yet half realized the idea of democracy.

The national banks for a long time found shelter behind the Constitution. That has been the fortress of every great wrong. That was the instrument with which treason first armed itself to destroy the Union. Logic failed and the sword was drawn. The issue of the battle was that the Constitution established a nation. It would seem that there are a few relics of the ante-national period. During the debate upon this very bill in the department of the Government "where wealth accumulates and men decay" [laughter] the Constitution was the weapon used to kill all measures to substitute Government currency for the notes of the banks. The same weapon was then used for the purpose of cutting down the Government.

Every national banker is an ultra-strict constructionist. He denied the constitutional right of the Government to issue paper money, even as a war measure. He acquiesced in the course taken by the Government during the war, because he was a patriot (?) and was willing that anything should be done to save the Union. But when the Supreme Court decided that the Constitution was not the grave of popular government, and that not only a "war" but a "peace" greenback was constitutional, he begun war on the Constitution. That decision will stand, however, and the Constitution will never be amended so as to limit the rights of the people. "A throne," said Napoleon, "is a mere block of wood covered with velvet." Yet kings exercise the very power which is here sought to be taken from the sovereign—the people. The national banker would make our Constitution mean less than the block of wood stripped of its velvet covering. He would even convert it into a guillotine to behead the sovereign.

Why should the United States be deprived of this function of government? What is the argument in favor of the exercise of this function by corporations, creatures of the Government? That its exercise by Congress would be a dangerous centralization of power. Where should power be centralized? In the creature instead of the creator? Power centralized in a single man gives us a king. Power centralized in a class gives us an aristocracy. Power centralized in the hands of the people gives us democracy. [Applause.] A proper centralization of the powers is necessary to a just distribution of the benefits of government. When the Secretary of the Treasury says that the recent legal-tender decision of the Supreme Court casts a "dark cloud over the financial outlook" he speaks against democracy. He speaks in favor of an aristocracy of wealth. That decision is simply a declaration of our national independence in money matters as well as in other matters. The tories in Wall street may rail at it, but the people welcome it as their shield and protection against the incoming flood of the power of national banks. To one who believes in panics as a means of grace I have no doubt it bodes evil.

This is a currency question, not a banking question. I am not opposed to banks. I recognize their necessity. As institutions for loaning money, receiving deposits, and buying and selling exchanges they render an essential service to commerce. As an agency of trade they are second in importance only to money itself. Our civilization can not dispense with them any more than it can dispense with merchants and railroads. But the issue of currency is not a function of banking. It is a function superadded to banking. Banking is a private business.

The issue of currency for the people is a public act; it covers the whole nation; it is the business of the nation. Even England has outgrown the dogma of Wall street—that there should be a union of banking functions with those of issue. The issue department of the Bank of England is an office of the state, and Prof. Bonamy Price tells us that the nation receives twice as much profit from the issue as the bank. We are not keeping pace with monarchies, and so long as New York makes our laws we will be in the rear. If we must get our financial policy from England, let us not go to her graveyards for it. Let us not adopt a system which she has outgrown and thrown aside. Let us not wear her old clothes. That is toryism gone to seed. [Laughter.]

The advocates of this measure urge it as a remedy for the contraction of the national-bank circulation. Is it a remedy? What is the cause of this contraction? It has been well answered, the high premium value of the bonds. What will be the effect of the passage of this bill? To increase the premium value of the bonds. Will not that aggravate the difficulty? "No," answer these homeopathic doctors of finance, "like cures like." The evils of a currency whose movements depend on the fluctuations of the bond market can not be cured or mitigated by any such treatment as this. The only sure cure is death. The national banks are simply private money-making institutions, and the currency which they furnish to the people must first yield a harvest of wealth to them. If we depend upon them we must make it more profitable for them to take out circulation than to sell their bonds. In so far as the appreciation of the value of the bonds neutralizes the benefits conferred by this bill, so far will they, regardless of the public welfare, feel coerced by their own interest to sell their bonds and retire their circulation. This is a "public-be-damned" kind of currency. [Laughter.] Its movements are regulated wholly in the interests of greedy, grasping corporations. Their concern for the people is the concern of the wolf for the lamb.

Suppose, however, these homeopathic doctors are correct in their opinion, and the bill has the effect predicted by them, how will it affect the tax-payer, the man who pays the bonds? He might properly be called the forgotten man in every act of Congress. These bonds constitute a mortgage on his property. To increase the premium value of the bonds is to add so much to his mortgage. Is this right? Is it honest? Was this nominated in the bond? No; this is blood-money, every dollar of it "coined infamy." Is this apple of Sodom to be your New Year's gift to the people already overburdened with taxation? Are the tax-payers criminals that they should be subjected to this fine? Who are they? They are the knights of labor, the producers of wealth. They are the builders and supporters of the nation. Every dollar paid by them in taxes is the frozen sweat of labor. You have just struck out the enacting clause of a bill for the relief of the tax-payers, and now, as a crowning act of injustice, you propose to pass this bill for the benefit of the tax-eaters.

This bill has many of the qualities of a credit-strengthening act. It has been the policy of the Republican party to strengthen the credit of the Government every little while, not by the payment of its debt, but by increasing the value of its bonds to the holders of them. Every dollar legislated into bonds is legislated out of the pockets of the people. The bondholders have been enriched and the people have been impoverished long enough by this species of robbery.

This question of currency is a question of privilege, of prerogative. Our Constitution, sir, is not the coffin, but an ordinance of national sovereignty. To institute and regulate the medium of exchange is the prerogative of sovereignty. It is a right which belongs to the people, and they will sooner or later take possession of their own. They are coming into power. Free society is the greatest educator in the world, and education is the kind of dynamite with which to blow up false systems. Thought is freedom. Thought is the builder of republics and destroyer of despotisms. When the people begin to think, kings tremble and thrones totter. When the people begin to think, new and better laws are made. When the people begin to think, a fire begins to burn that will turn to ashes every page of our statutes blotted and desecrated with unholy class laws. [Applause.]

The Democratic party is under no political obligations to these corporations. It has been lifted into power, not by them, but in spite of them. It has been lifted into power by the people. Its triumph is a victory over monopolies. Let it be a party for the people and the days of its life are not numbered.

Mr. Speaker, during the debate upon the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter certain members of this House were urged to refrain from taking any part in the decision of that question, not that they had any pecuniary interest in the event of it, but because, as was alleged, the condition of their minds was such that they could not cast a fair and impartial vote. [Laughter.] If there was any reason in that argument, when there was no pecuniary interest involved, how much greater the reason that no member should vote upon any question in the event of which he has a pecuniary interest. It is a rule of this House, and a wise one, that "every member shall vote upon each question put, unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question."

Now, I say to gentlemen who are presidents and stockholders of national banks, if there are any, that good faith, good taste, and your own pecuniary interest in the event of this question should cause you to refrain from voting or speaking upon it. It is a matter of vital importance to the corporations to which you belong. You are beneficiaries of this bill. [Applause.] John Quincy Adams had such a fine sense of honor that he sold his stock in the United States Bank in order that he might be qualified as a member of Congress to vote upon the bill to recharter that institution. I commend his example as worthy of imitation. I do not expect, sir, that any word of mine will defeat this measure. The bill will pass. The master outside has given the order and the only question here is, "Who will be the first to obey?" I now offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, to be considered at the proper time, and yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

After the word "repealed" in the fourteenth line insert the following:

"The Comptroller of the Currency is hereby directed to require, at such times as he may think proper, all national banks to report to him whether or not they receive standard silver dollars on deposit and receive and pay the same over their counters on the same terms as gold. And all national banks that refuse to receive standard silver dollars on deposit and to receive and pay the same over their counters on the same terms as gold are hereby denied the privileges of this act. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, in calling bonds for payment, to call first the bonds of those banks which refuse the standard silver dollars, as aforesaid."

Mr. DINGLEY. I make the point of order that this amendment is not germane to the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. That point of order will be considered as reserved. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YAPLE] has yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM], who has yielded fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK].

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the consideration of measures so important as the two bills brought before the House under this special order should be limited to one half day. I trust I may have the attention of the House while I endeavor to point out my objections to the present bill, attempting to address myself to the judgment of those who are expected to vote upon the measure.

I believe that among the most important questions before the two Houses of Congress are the financial questions. We are having throughout the length and breadth of the land a business depression that is to be attributed in my judgment largely to the unsettled condition of the finances. I have before me here a communication addressed to Bradstreet, in which the writer says:

Among other causes to account for the existing depression in all departments of business there is ever arising the question of the extent and effect of the contraction of the bank-note currency that is to ensue, &c.

I believe that the uncertain condition, the elastic condition of our currency system lies at the root of our financial trouble. The currency in my judgment should be inelastic. It should be fixed in its volume, and the elasticity of the finances should depend upon the coin that comes and goes.

The avowed object of this bill is to prevent contraction of the bank-note currency, or rather to induce the banks to issue more paper.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as has been said by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YAPLE], we have no assurance that this bill will accomplish its purpose. To-day the national banks of this country under their charters and capital have the right to issue currency to the amount of $471,500,000. As a matter of fact they are supplying the country with only $286,500,000. If they do not see fit to avail themselves of the privileges of the limit now allowed them by law, what assurance have we that this bill will accomplish anything?

The great objection to the national banking system is that it takes from the Government the duty of controlling the volume of currency, of giving to the country its currency, and transfers this duty to the banks, under whose operations the currency may be contracted and expanded at their pleasure.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we shall have no rest from this continuous meddling with the currency until Congress shall put its foot down upon all interference by private corporations, stop all this temporizing with the question, and assert the power and dignity of this nation with its boundless resources, and say, "We will give the country a currency of so many hundred million dollars; we will pledge the faith of the country that this currency shall not be depreciated in its purchasing power or its value; that it shall be maintained side by side and at par with coin, if you choose; that its volume shall be neither diminished nor expanded to any dangerous degree."

Every session Congress is appealed to by the banking and bond interests for legislation in their favor, with the threat that the currency will be reduced or contracted if we do not comply with their demands. Business is disturbed and confidence is shaken. I am not an alarmist. I am addressing you as one business man may address another, and looking to the future only.

The legislation of the past twenty years has been outrageously in the interest of the money-changers and schemers, who fatten at the expense of the masses, and the country has suffered because Congress has yielded to the advice and the demands of the money centers and those who seek by national laws to secure an advantage over their fellow-men.

Though we are powerless to undo what has been done in the past, there is no excuse for us if we refuse to profit now and in the future by the lessons which the past has taught us.

It is no longer a question of coin or currency. The business wants of our people and the condition of the country require a paper currency. It is immaterial whether there is coin in the world or in this country sufficient to meet the demands of commerce and trade. Our people can not use it to a great extent. The countries of Europe, with their small area, dense population, of settled habits and habitation, are no guide to us and our wants.

The habits of a people come of these conditions, necessities, and convenience. Our habits require paper money. We travel over vast distances and handle money freely. By Government estimate there is now about $610,000,000 of gold in the country, while of paper currency we have:

Treasury notes, or greenbacks	$346,681,016
National-bank notes, about	286,500,000
Silver certificates	131,556,531
Gold certificates	120,343,320

From this it will be seen that, after making proper allowance for the gold and currency held in the vaults of the Treasury, there is in nominal circulation in the United States about two-thirds as much gold coin as there is of paper money and currency of all descriptions. Yet I feel that I am safe in saying that we find in actual use by the people one thousand dollars in currency to one dollar in gold. And thus we have an actual demonstration that coin is not adapted to the wants of our people and business.

No one disputes that we must have a national currency of some kind. It is the duty of Congress to supply this medium of exchange; and if the Forty-eighth Congress expires without meeting this responsibility and discharging this duty it shows itself recreant to the trust reposed in it. The Democratic party is now the dominant party of the country and is chargeable with the results of action or inaction.

The first thing necessary is to settle once and for all the future of the paper money. No man will deny that we should have a settled, sound, and honest fiscal policy and monetary system; one that requires no tinkering and no expedients. One objection to the McPherson bill is that it is an expedient; it is a makeshift only. No man pretends here that it supplies a permanent system. I believe we have come to the time when this House should have the courage to choose one of two schemes, and it should make that a permanent one. Either we should have as the permanent system of this country the national banking system, or we should have as a permanent currency the Treasury note. We should have the courage here to adopt a system that shall last for all time; that shall supply a currency of sufficient volume and of a character that will give the country confidence in it.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say here that I shall vote for the motion which I understand is to be made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER], to recommit this bill with instructions, not because I favor his bill, but because I believe we ought now to choose between the two systems and fix upon one or the other. We should say either we will have a Treasury note that is a legal tender for all debts, public and private, with a fixed volume and with reasonable measures by the Government to maintain that note side by side with coin, or we will give the country a permanent national debt and issue bonds designed exclusively for use by national banks as a basis for notes to be by them supplied to the country. Between the two we must choose. There should be no hesitation on this point. As I said before, the volume of currency should be fixed at a point sufficient to meet the requirements of trade and business.

The banks can at any time contract the currency or expand it as they choose. This is a dangerous prerogative. Is it safer to trust this to the Government, that is interested in the welfare of the people, or in the banks, that are interested in making money off the people? But beyond this it is impossible in the very nature of things that under the national banking system we can have a fixed volume of currency. And, I repeat, this is essential to stability.

Here and there I hear it said that it is dangerous to intrust Congress with the power of regulating the currency. Fear is expressed that too much money would be issued; an excess of currency would depreciate its purchasing power; it would be to the advantage of the poor man as against the rich, and in favor of the debtor as against the creditor. I may be pardoned for saying what every man in this assembly knows to be truth, that there is no danger of the poor man getting any advantage here. The strong are always here. Nine-tenths of the legislation here is in the interest of the strong and wealthy. If the poor man gets his just share of attention here it will be after a wonderful change has come over the legislation of the past and far beyond my most sanguine hopes of the future.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I prefer to reserve my time until I have heard gentlemen on the other side. I hope those gentlemen on the other side will do us the justice to consume some of their time before we are asked further to proceed.

Mr. WILKINS. Consume your hour and we will take the next hour. If no person desires to be heard further on the question then, Mr. Speaker, I will call for the previous question. I do not wish to do it if there are other gentlemen who desire to be heard.

Mr. DINGLEY. There are other gentlemen who wish to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor unless he yields it.

Mr. WILKINS. Then let him proceed.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall delay the House for more than a few minutes on this subject, as we have been warned heretofore that we will be allowed only an hour on each side of the question, a time so short that it is hardly worth while starting out to discuss the general merits of this bill, without going into the general merits of the question at all. The fact that this House refused at the last session to consider this bill or any other bill touching the question of finance is to me a very humiliating spectacle. You take up hours in discussing the question of the election of individual members, as was done in the Taylor and Warner case. You consumed almost the whole of the last session in the discussion of your horizontal nonsense, but when it comes to the question which in my judgment is more important than all the other questions you tell us we will give you a few hours for its discussion.

I do not know but this bill should be entitled a bill to offer a premium to the present bondholders and to perpetuate the national debt, for that is the only practical result that will be reached by the passage of this bill. It is merely a makeshift on the general question of finance. It is simply postponing the day when you must act upon some permanent measure for the relief of the country. Of all the bills which have been offered in both branches of Congress, of all the arguments that have been advanced, not one has been shown which does not involve the idea of basing the national banks upon the national debt. If that be true, then the days of the issuing functions of the national banks are numbered, and can not possibly last beyond the payment of the national debt. Why is it that Congress, assuming to be statesmen, will not at once give us some bill, some remedy that will be permanent in its nature, and settle this question for a reasonable time at least.

The refunding bill which is proposed to be offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] is only a makeshift. It is only putting off the final day. The day of judgment will come, and inasmuch as the Democratic party is now starting out as the party in power, why then, gentlemen, have you not the courage to take up something which will be a permanent measure, which will give permanent relief, and which will settle this question at least for a reasonable time? You may attempt to shift it for a moment, for a day, for a session, for a year; but you must meet it eventually, and you ought to meet it now.

Gentlemen tell us it will not do to substitute for this national-bank currency the legal-tender note. Gentlemen tell us that although the Supreme Court has settled the question as to the constitutionality of it, that that decision will be reversed, that that decision is an erroneous one, and attempts even are made by gentlemen—all Democrats—in both branches of Congress to change the Constitution so as to nullify and vitiate that decision. Do you mean to wait and let the country call all these financial horrors upon its head and pass on with this troubled question unsettled until you have changed the Constitution? Do you mean to wait until you have reversed the decision of the Supreme Court? Let me tell you if you had any hope because your own member of that court gave his dissenting opinion, I wish to say in that even he was greatly in error as to the fact—for I have not time and will not undertake to discuss the legal status and constitutionality of that decision in its general scope—but when he says that Chief-Justice Chase as Justice of the Supreme Court reversed his decision as Secretary of the Treasury he says that which is not correct.

But I say here, and I challenge contradiction, that there is not a decision in the books which does not establish the absolute power of the National Government to issue Treasury notes and make them legal-tender. Take the cases in Wallace and read them. They only say that for the payment of antecedent debts, contracted to be paid for in gold, you can not pass a law declaring any other currency a legal tender in which you can pay that antecedent debt.

That is the full extent of the dissenting opinion in every case except one case—by Justice Field. There is a uniform line of decisions running down from the foundation of the Government—decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the several States—all of which agree upon the right of the National Government to issue legal-tender notes; and I ask you gentlemen why will you not now exercise that function? It is your right, it is your duty to do so, and if you will exercise that right it is a permanent relief; it is the establishment of a permanent system. It is the practical wiping out of the national-bank currency, and you will have the honor of doing to-day what must be done in the near future.

I intend offering a substitute that I had printed in the RECORD yesterday, which embraces the idea of issuing legal-tender notes just as fast as the national-bank notes are surrendered. It is not revolutionary in any of its conditions or in any sense. It is not so radical as to create any difficulty in the finances of the country. It will act slowly but surely until it has replaced every national-bank note that is redeemed either by the bank asking a reduction of its circulation by going into liquidation or by the expiration of its charter by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue legal-tender notes to destroy the bonds as soon as they are paid, and in that way furnishing a substitute for the national-bank note as a circulating medium. It will place in the Government the power that justly belongs to it. It will act, as I have said, slowly just as these notes are brought in. It will give a circulating medium just as fast as it is required by the withdrawal of the national-bank notes.

Mr. Speaker, I shall now ask to offer my substitute for this bill.

Mr. WILKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILKINS. Is it proper to reserve the point of order upon that amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will be. The amendment can be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for a bill to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, SECTION 1. Strike out all of section 5224 of the Revised Statutes of the United States after the word "business," in the third line, and insert the following: "Or retire its circulation, or any part thereof has been made, the bonds deposited by the association to secure payment of its notes shall be reassigned to it in the manner prescribed by section 5162. And thereafter the association and its shareholders shall stand discharged from all liabilities upon the circulating notes, and those notes shall be redeemed and canceled at the Treasury of the United States. And if any such bank shall fail to make the deposit and take up its bonds for thirty days after the expiration of the time specified, the Comptroller of the Currency shall cancel the bonds pledged for the circulation of said bank, and after providing for the redemption and cancellation of said circulation pay over any balance remaining to the bank or its legal representative."

SEC. 2. That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, shall, upon the expiration of its charter, return to the Treasurer of the United States its circulating notes, or make a sufficient deposit of lawful money to redeem its outstanding circulation, whereupon the bonds deposited by the association to secure payment of its notes shall be reassigned to it in the manner prescribed by section 5162; and thereafter the association and its shareholders shall stand discharged from all liabilities upon the circulating notes, and said notes shall be redeemed and canceled at the Treasury of the United States. And if any such association shall fail to make the deposit and take up its bonds for three years after the expiration of its charter, the Comptroller of the Currency shall cancel the bonds pledged for the circulation of said association; and after providing for the redemption and cancellation of said circulation he shall pay over any balance remaining to the association or its legal representatives.

SEC. 3. That from and after the passage of this act the Treasurer shall not be permitted to issue or sell any United States bonds.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be printed and engraved notes of the United States, in addition to those heretofore authorized, and of the same kind and character as those now in circulation, in denominations of one, two, five, ten, twenty, fifty, and one hundred dollars, to an amount not exceeding the aggregate national-bank-note circulation.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to substitute and pay out the notes hereby authorized, in lieu of the national-bank notes now outstanding and in circulation, as soon as said bank notes are redeemed.

SEC. 6. That for the purpose of carrying into effect the objects of this act the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and proper. And all acts and parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to ask if this amendment is offered now to be considered as a pending amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania proposed to offer it as a substitute, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILKINS] has made the point of order against it. The point of order will be considered as pending against the substitute.

Mr. BRUMM. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY].

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the sole purpose of the McPherson bill, so-called, now under consideration, is to increase the amount of money as a circulating medium in the hands of the people.

It proposes to do this by permitting the national banks to issue notes up to the par value of the United States bonds deposited by them with the Government. The present law only allows an issue of national-bank notes up to 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds so deposited. This bill, therefore, permits an increased issue of 10 per cent. upon the bonds deposited by a national bank to secure its circulation.

NO NEW PLAN OF BANKING PROPOSED.

This bill offers no new system of banking, no new kind of money for the people, nor is it intended to perpetuate our national banking system. It should have no terrors for the most extreme Greenbacker even if he belong to that volcanic few who suffer from an eruption of words when any measure is proposed that may have in it the to them startling words "national banks." The Greenbacker, pure and simple, above all men, claims to desire a large amount of money in circulation among the people. This bill ought not to meet the hostility of this class; for, as I have before stated, its purpose is to give the people more money, and a safe, a well-secured money.

I may here state that the brainiest Greenbacker in Iowa, and he never was a candidate for office, told me in October last that he was strongly in favor of this legislation. The questions to be answered before acting upon this measure are few and simple, as it seems to me. The first one to be considered is this:

IS THERE A CONTRACTION OF THE CURRENCY GOING ON AND IS IT LIKELY TO CONTINUE?

The Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency answer this question.

In his last report the Secretary says:

Inasmuch as about $135,000,000 of the circulation of banks is based upon our 3 per cent. bonds, which are now redeemable and being rapidly redeemed, remedial action can not be postponed beyond the present session if a rapid reduction of our bank-note circulation is to be avoided. The subject is a very important one, and should receive immediate attention.

The foregoing calls attention to the fact of a reduction, and also states some of the reasons for it. The following from the same report gives more light:

The market prices of the 4 per cent. and 4½ per cent. bonds of the United States have declined somewhat during the past year; but that these bonds are still too high to enable banks to base circulation upon them at a profit is plain, from the fact that the circulation has been voluntarily decreased more than $25,000,000 during the year.

The Comptroller of the Currency puts the decrease in circulation for the year ending November 1, 1883, at $8,284,017, and for the year ending November 1, 1884, the decrease is $24,170,676. As to the probable reduction in the future I quote his own words:
